PREFACE.

THE literature of the Hindus has now been cultivated, for many years, with singular diligence, and, in many of its branches, with eminent success. There are some departments, however, which are yet but partially and imperfectly investigated; and we are far from being in possession of that knowledge which the authentic writings of the Hindus alone can give us of their religion, mythology, and historical traditions.

From the materials to which we have hitherto had access, it seems probable that there have been three principal forms in which the religion of the Hindus has existed, at as many different periods. The duration of those periods, the circumstances of their succession, and the precise state of the national faith at each season, it is not possible to trace with any approach to accuracy. The premises have been too imperfectly determined to authorize other than conclusions of a general and somewhat vague description; and those remain to be hereafter confirmed, or corrected, by more extensive works, as far as we are acquainted with them, indicate a date long anterior to that of any other class of Sanskrit writings. It is yet, however, scarcely safe to advance an opinion of the precise belief, or philosophy, which they inculcate. To enable us to judge of their tendency, we have only a general sketch of their arrangement and contents, with a few extracts, by Mr. Colebrooke, in the Asiatic Researches; 1 a few incidental observations by Mr. Ellis, in the same miscellany; 2 and a translation of the first book of the Samhitá, or collection of the prayers of the Rig-veda, by Dr. Rosen;3 and some of the Upanishads, or speculative treatises, attached to, rather than part of, the Vedas, by Rammohun Roy.4* Of the religion taught in the Vedas, Mr. Colebrooke's opinion will probably be received as that which is best entitled to deference; as, certainly, no Sanskrit scholar has been equally conversant with the original works. "The real doctrine of the whole Indian scripture is the unity of the deity, in whom the universe is comprehended; and the seeming polytheism which it exhibits offers the elements, and the stars and planets, as gods. The three principal manifestations of the divinity, with other personified attributes and energies, and most of the other gods of Hindu mythology, are, indeed, mentioned, or, at least, indicated, in the Vedas. But the worship of deified heroes is no part of that system; nor are the incarnations of deities suggested in any other portion of the text which I have yet seen; though such are sometimes hinted at by the commentators." Some of these statements may, perhaps, require modification; for, without a careful examination of all the prayers of the Vedas, it would be hazardous to assert that they contain no indication whatever of hero-worship; and, certainly, they do appear to allude, occasionally, to the Avatáras, or incarnations, of Vishnu. Still, however, it is true that the prevailing character of the ritual of the Vedas is the worship of the personified elements; of Agni or fire; Indra, the firmament; Váyu, the air; Varuna, the water; of Aditya, the sun; Soma, the moon; and other elementary and planetary personages. It is also true that the worship of the Vedas is, for the most part, domestic worship, consisting of prayers and oblations offeredin their own houses, not in temples-by individuals, for individual good, and addressed to unreal presences, not to visible types. In a word, the religion of the Vedas was not idolatry.

^{*} Or Miscellaneous Essays, Vol. I., pp. 110 and 111.

It is not possible to conjecture when this more simple and primitive form of adoration was succeeded by the worship of images and types, representing Brahmá, Vishńu, Śiva, and other imaginary beings, constituting a mythological pantheon of most ample extent; or when Ráma and Křishňa, who appear to have been, originally, real and historical characters, were elevated to the dignity of divinities. Image-worship is alluded to by Manu, in several passages,1 but with an intimation that those Brahmans who subsist by ministering in temples are an inferior and degraded class. The story of the Rámáyana and Mahábhárata turns wholly upon the doctrine of incarnations; all the chief dramatis personæ of the poems being impersonations of gods, and demigods, and celestial spirits. The ritual appears to be that of the Vedas; and it may be doubted if any allusion to image-worship occurs. But the doctrine of propitiation by penance and praise prevails throughout; and Vishnu and Siva are the especial objects of panegyric and invocation. In these two works, then, we trace unequivocal indications of a departure from the elemental worship of the Vedas, and the origin or elaboration of legends which form the great body of the mythological religion of the Hindus. How far they only improved upon the cosmogony and chronology of their predecessors, or in what degree the traditions of families and dynasties may originate with them, are questions that can only be determined when the Vedas and the two works in question shall have been more thoroughly examined.

The different works known by the name of Puránas are evidently derived from the same religious system as the Rámáyana and Mahábhárata, or from the mythoheroic stage of Hindu belief. They present, however, peculiarities which designate their belonging to a later period, and to an important modification in the progress of opinion. They repeat the theoretical cosmogony of the two great poems; they expand and systematize the chronological computations; and they give a more definite and connected representation of the mythological fictions and the historical traditions. But, besides these and other particulars, which may be derivable from an old, if not from a primitive, era, they offer characteristic peculiarities of a more modern description, in the paramount importance which they assign to individual divinities, in the variety and purport of the rites and observances addressed to them, and in the invention of new legends illustrative of the power and graciousness of those deities, and of the efficacy of implicit devotion to them. Siva and Vishnu, under one or other form, are almost the sole objects that claim the homage of the Hindus, in the Puránas; departing from the domestic and elemental ritual of the Vedas, and exhibiting a sectarial fervour and exclusiveness not traceable in the Rámáyana, and only to a qualified extent in the Mahábhárata. They are no longer authorities for Hindu belief, as a whole: they are special guides for separate and, sometimes, conflicting branches of it; compiled for the evident purpose of promoting the preferential, or, in some cases, the sole, worship of Vishnu, or of Siva.1

That the Puránas always bore the character here given of them may admit of reasonable doubt: that it correctly applies to them as they now are met with, the following pages will irrefragably substantiate. It is possible, however, that there may have been an earlier class of Puránas, of which those we now have are but the partial and adulterated representatives. The identity of the legends in many of them, and, still more, the identity of the words-for, in several of them, long passages are literally the same-is a sufficient proof that, in all such cases, they must be copied either from some other similar work, or from a common and prior original. It is not unusual, also, for a fact to be stated upon the authority of an 'old stanza', which is cited accordingly; showing the existence of an earlier source of information: and, in very many instances, legends are alluded to, not told; evincing acquaintance with their prior narration somewhere else. The name itself, Purána, which implies 'old', indicates the object of the compilation to be the preservation of ancient traditions; a purpose, in the present condition of the Puránas, very imperfectly fulfilled. Whatever weight may be attached to these considerations, there is no disputing evidence to the like effect, afforded by other and unquestionable authority. The description given, by Mr. Colebrooke, of the contents of a Purána is taken from Sanskrit writers. The Lexicon of Amara Simha gives, as a synonym of Purána, Pancha-lakshana, 'that which has five characteristic topics'; and there is no difference of opinion, amongst the scholiasts, as to what these are. They are, as Mr. Colebrooke mentions: I. Primary creation, or cosmogony; II. Secondary creation, or the destruction and renovation of worlds, including chronology; III. Genealogy of gods and patriarchs; IV. Reigns of the Manus, or periods called Manwantaras; and, V. History, or such particulars as have been preserved of the princes of the solar and lunar races, and of their descendants to modern times. Such, at any rate, were the constituent and characteristic portions of a Purána, in the days of Amara Simha, fifty-six years before the Christian era; and, if the

Poems, and Puránas, a fourth may be dated from the influence exercised by the Tantras upon Hindu practice and belief: but we are yet too little acquainted with those works, or their origin, to speculate safely upon their consequences.

A variation of reading in the beginning of the second line is noticed by Rámáśrama, the scholiast on Amara, aparticulari, 'Destruction of the earth and the rest, or final dissolution;' in which case the genealogies of heroes and princes are comprised in those of the patriarchs.

Professor Wilson—Sanskrit Dictionary, first edition, Preface, p. v.—asserts that "all tradition concurs in enumerating him amongst the learned men who, in the metaphorical phraseology of the Hindus, are denominated the 'nine gems' of the court of Vikramaditya. * * * Authorities which assert the contemporary existence of Amara and Vikramaditya might be indefinitely multiplied; and those are equally numerous which class him amongst the 'nine gems'." edition of his Dictionary, under the word जारात, the Professor explains the "nine gems" to be: "The nine men of letters at the court of Vikramáditya, or, Dhanwantari, Kshapańaka, Amarasińha, Śanku, Vetálabhatta, Ghatakarpara, Kálidása, Varáhamihira, and Vararuchi." The tradition about these ornaments he thinks—Meghadúta, second edition, Preface, p. v.—to be one of those regarding which "there is no reason to dispute the truth."

The "authorities" spoken of in the first of the preceding extracts are not specified by Professor Wilson; and they are not known to have fallen yet in the way of any one else. Those authorities apart, he adduces a stanza about the "nine gems", of which he says, that it "appears in a great measure traditionary only; as I have not been able to trace it to any authentic source, although it is in the mouth of every Pandit, when interrogated on the subject."

The stanza in question occurs in the Jyotirvidábharaha, near its conclusion, where we find the following verses:

वर्षे स्मृतिश्रुतिविचार्विवेकरस्थे श्रीभारते खधतिसंमितदेशपीठे। मत्तोऽधुना क्रांतिरियं सति मालवेन्द्रे श्रीविक्रमार्कनृपराजवरे सभासीत्॥ गड़: सवाम्बरकचिमीणरंगदत्तो जिष्णस्त्रलोचनहरी घटकपराखः। अम्बेरिय सन्ति कवयोरमरसिंहपूर्वा यसीव विक्रमन्पस्य सभासदोऽमी॥ सत्यो वराहमिंहिरः श्रुतसननामा श्रीवादरायणमणित्यकुमार्सिंहाः। श्रीविज्ञमार्कनुपसंसदि सन्ति चैते श्रीकालतन्त्रकवयस्त्वपरे महादाः॥ धन्वनारिः चपणकोऽमरसिंहग्रङ्ख-वेतालभड्घटकपरकालिदासाः। खातो वराहमिहिरो नुपतेः सभायां रतानि वे वरक्चिनेव विक्रमस्य॥ 98 -36-

Here we see named, as contemporaries at the court of Vikramáditya, lord of Málava, in the year 3068 of the Kali age, or B. C. 33: Maúi, Amsudatta, Jishúu, Trilochana, and Hari; also Satya, Śrutasena, Bádaráyańa, Maúittha, and Kumárasiúha, astronomers; and the "nine gems" already particularized.

The writer of the Jyotirvidábharana is represented as professing to be one with the author of the Raghuvainśa. As to Vikramáditya, 180 regions are said to have been subject to his sway. Further, according to some verses of which I have not quoted the original, there were 800 viceroys subordinate to him, of picked warriors he had ten millions, and he possessed 400,000 boats. His victims in battle, among Śakas alone, are multiplied to the whimsical aggregate of 555,555,555. These destroyed, he established his era.

There is every reason for believing the Jyotirvidábharana to be not only pseudonymous but of recent composition. And now we are prepared to form an opinion touching the credibility of the tradition, so far as yet traced, which concerns the "nine gems" of Vikramáditya.

In the Benares Magazine for 1852, pp. 274-276, I first printed and translated the verses just cited and abstracted. A detailed English version of them has been given by the learned Dr. Bháu Dájí, in the Journal of the Bombay Branch of the Royal As. Soc., January, 1862, pp. 26 and 27.

more authentic character than most of its fellows can pretend to. Yet, even in this instance, we have a book upon the institutes of society and obsequial rites interposed between the Manwantaras and the genealogies of princes; and a life of Krishna, separating the latter from an account of the end of the world; besides the insertion of various legends of a manifestly popular and sectarial character. No doubt, many of the Puránas, as they now are, correspond with the view which Colonel Vans Kennedy takes of their purport. "I cannot discover, in them," he remarks, "any other object than that of religious instruction." "The description of the earth and of the planetary system, and the lists of royal races that occur in them," he asserts to be "evidently extraneous, and not essential circumstances; as they are omitted in some Puránas, and very concisely illustrated, in others; while, on the contrary, in all the Puránas, some or other of the leading principles, rites, and observances of the Hindu religion are fully dwelt upon, and illustrated, either by suitable legends, or by prescribing the ceremonies to be practised, and the prayers and invocations to be employed. in the worship of different deities."1 Now, however accurate this description may be of the Puránas as they are, it is clear that it does not apply to what they were when they were synonymously designated as Panchalakshańas or 'treatises on five topics'; not one of which five is ever specified, by text or comment, to be "religious instruction". In the knowledge of Amara Simha,

the lists of princes were not extraneous and unessential; and their being now so considered by a writer so well acquainted with the contents of the Puránas as Colonel Vans Kennedy, is a decisive proof that, since the days of the lexicographer, they have undergone some material alteration, and that we have not, at present, the same works, in all respects, that were current, under the denomination of Puránas, in the century prior to Christianity.

The inference deduced from the discrepancy between the actual form and the older definition of a Purána, unfavourable to the antiquity of the extant works generally, is converted into certainty, when we come to examine them in detail. For, although they have no dates attached to them, yet circumstances are sometimes mentioned, or alluded to, or references to authorities are made, or legends are narrated, or places are particularized, of which the comparatively recent date is indisputable, and which enforce a corresponding reduction of the antiquity of the work in which they are discovered. At the same time, they may be acquitted of subservience to any but sectarial imposture. They were pious frauds for temporary purposes: they never emanated from any impossible combination of the Brahmans to fabricate for the antiquity of the entire Hindu system any claims which it cannot fully support. A very great portion of the contents of many, some portion of the contents of all, is genuine and old. The sectarial interpolation, or embellishment, is always sufficiently palpable to be set aside without injury to the more authentic and primitive material; and the Puránas, although they belong especially to that stage of the Hindu religion in which faith in some one divinity was the prevailing principle, are, also, a valuable record of the form of Hindu belief which came next in order to that of the Vedas; which grafted heroworship upon the simpler ritual of the latter; and which had been adopted, and was extensively, perhaps universally, established in India, at the time of the Greek invasion. The Hercules of the Greek writers was, indubitably, the Balaráma of the Hindus; and their notices of Mathurá on the Jumna, and of the kingdom of the Suraseni and the Pandæan country, evidence the prior currency of the traditions which constitute the argument of the Mahábhárata, and which are constantly repeated in the Puránas, relating to the Páńdava and Yádava races, to Krishna and his contemporary heroes, and to the dynasties of the solar and lunar kings.

The theogony and cosmogony of the Puránas may, probably, be traced to the Vedas. They are not, as far as is yet known, described in detail in those works; but they are frequently alluded to, in a strain more or less mystical and obscure, which indicates acquaintance with their existence, and which seems to have supplied the Puránas with the groundwork of their systems. The scheme of primary or elementary creation they borrow from the Sánkhya philosophy, which is, probably, one of the oldest forms of speculation on man and nature, amongst the Hindus. Agreeably, however, to that part of the Pauránik character which there is reason to suspect of later origin, their inculcation of the worship of a favourite deity, they combine the interposition of a creator with the independent evolution of matter, in a somewhat contradictory and unintelligible style. It is evident, too, that their accounts of secondary creation, or the development of the existing forms of things, and the disposition of the universe, are derived from several and different sources; and it appears very likely that they are to be accused of some of the incongruities and absurdities by which the narrative is disfigured, in consequence of having attempted to assign reality and significancy to what was merely metaphor or mysticism. There is, however, amidst the unnecessary complexity of the description, a general agreement, amongst them, as to the origin of things and their final distribution; and, in many of the circumstances, there is a striking concurrence with the ideas which seem to have pervaded the whole of the ancient world, and which we may, therefore, believe to be faithfully represented in the Puránas.

The pantheism of the Puránas is one of their invariable characteristics; although the particular divinity who is all things, from whom all things proceed, and to whom all things return, be diversified according to their individual sectarial bias. They seem to have derived the notion from the Vedas; but, in them, the one universal Being is of a higher order than a personification of attributes or elements, and, however imperfectly conceived, or unworthily described, is God. In the Puránas, the one only Supreme Being is supposed to be manifest in the person of Siva, or Vishnu, either in the way of illusion, or in sport; and one or other of these divinities is, therefore, also the cause of all that is,—is, himself, all that exists. The identity of God and nature is not a new notion: it was very general in the speculations of antiquity; but it assumed a new vigour in the early ages of Christianity, and was carried to an equal pitch of extravagance by the Platonic Christians as by the Saiva or Vaishnava Hindus. It seems not impossible that there was some communication between them. We know that there was an active communication between India and the Red Sea, in the early ages of the Christian era, and that doctrines, as well as articles of merchandise, were brought to Alexandria from the former. Epiphanius and Eusebius2 accuse Scythianus of having imported from India, in the second century, books on magic, and heretical notions leading to Manichæism; and it was at the same period that Ammonius Saccas instituted the sect of the new Platonists at Alexandria. The basis of his heresy was, that true philosophy derived its origin from the eastern nations. His doctrine of the identity of God and the universe is that of the Vedas and Puránas; and the practices he enjoined, as well as their object, were precisely those described in several of the Puránas, under the name of Yoga. His disciples were taught to extenuate, by mortification and contemplation, the bodily restraints upon the immortal spirit; so that, in this life, they might enjoy communion with the Supreme Being, and ascend, after death, to the universal Parent.3 That these are Hindu tenets, the following pages4 will testify; and, by the admission of their Alexandrian teacher, they originated in India. The importation was, perhaps, not wholly unrequited:

the loan may not have been left unpaid. It is not impossible that the Hindu doctrines received fresh animation from their adoption by the successors of Ammonius, and, especially, by the mystics, who may have prompted, as well as employed, the expressions of the Puráńas. Anquetil du Perron has given, in the introduction to his translation of the 'Oupnekhat', several hymns by Synesius, a bishop of the beginning of the fifth century, which may serve as parallels to many of the hymns and prayers addressed to Vishńu in the Vishńu Puráńa.

But the ascription, to individual and personal deities, of the attributes of the one universal and spiritual Supreme Being, is an indication of a later date than the Vedas, certainly, and, apparently, also, than the Rámáyańa, where Ráma, although an incarnation of Vishńu, commonly appears in his human character alone. There is something of the kind in the Mahábhárata, in respect to Krishna; especially in the philosophical episode known as the Bhagavad Gítá. In other places, the divine nature of Krishna is less decidedly affirmed; in some, it is disputed, or denied; and, in most of the situations in which he is exhibited in action, it is as a prince and warrior, not as a divinity. He exercises no superhuman faculties in the defence of himself or his friends, or in the defeat and destruction of his foes. The Mahábhárata, however, is, evidently, a work of various periods, and requires to be read throughout, carefully and critically, before its weight as an authority can be accurately appreciated. As it is now in type, 1—thanks to the public spirit of the Asiatic Society of Bengal, and their secretary, Mr. J. Prinsep,—it will not be long before the Sanskrit scholars of the continent will accurately appreciate its value.

The Puránas are, also, works of evidently different ages, and have been compiled under different circumstances, the precise nature of which we can but imperfectly conjecture from internal evidence and from what we know of the history of religious opinion in India. It is highly probable that, of the present popular forms of the Hindu religion, none assumed their actual state earlier than the time of Sankara Acharya, the great Saiva reformer, who flourished, in all likelihood, in the eighth or ninth century. Of the Vaishnava teachers, Rámánuja dates in the twelfth century; Madhwacharya, in the thirteenth; and Vallabha, in the sixteenth;² and the Puránas seem to have accompanied, or followed, their innovations; being obviously intended to advocate the doctrines they taught. This is to assign to some of them a very modern date, it is true; but I cannot think that a higher can, with justice, be ascribed to them. This, however, applies to some only out of the number, as I shall presently proceed to specify.

Another evidence of a comparatively modern date must be admitted in those chapters of the Puránas which, assuming a prophetic tone, foretell what dynasties of kings will reign in the Kali age. These chapters, it is true, are found but in four of the Puránas; but they are conclusive in bringing down the date of those four to a period considerably subsequent to Christianity. It is, also, to be remarked that the Váyu, Vishnu, Bhágavata, and Matsya Puránas, in which these particulars are foretold, have, in all other respects, the character of as great antiquity as any works of their class. ¹

The invariable form of the Puránas is that of a dialogue, in which some person relates its contents, in reply to the inquiries of another. This dialogue is interwoven with others, which are repeated as having been held, on other occasions, between different individuals, in consequence of similar questions having been asked. The immediate narrator is, commonly, though not constantly, Lomaharshana or Romaharshana, the disciple of Vyása, who is supposed to communicate what was imparted to him by his preceptor, as he had heard it from some other sage. Vyása, as will be seen in the body of the work, is a generic title, meaning an 'arranger' or 'compiler'. It is, in this age, applied to Krishna Dwaipáyana, the son of Parásara, who is said to have taught the Vedas and Puránas to various disciples, but who appears to have been the head of a college, or school, under whom various learned men gave to the sacred literature of the Hindus the form in which it now presents itself. In this task, the disciples, as they are termed, of Vyása were, rather, his colleagues and coadjutors; for they were already conversant with what he is fabled to have taught them;1 and, amongst them, Lomaharshana represents the class of persons who were especially charged with the record of political and temporal events. He is called Súta, as if it was a proper name: but it is, more correctly, a title; and Lomaharshana was 'a Súta', that is, a bard, or panegyrist, who was created, according to our text,2 to celebrate the exploits of princes, and who, according to the Váyu and Padma Puránas, has a right, by birth and profession, to narrate the Puránas, in preference even to the Brahmans.3 It is not unlikely, therefore, that we are to understand, by his being represented as the disciple of Vyása, the institution of some attempt, made under the direction of the latter, to collect, from the heralds and annalists of his day, the scattered traditions which they had imperfectly preserved: and hence the consequent appropriation of the Puránas, in a great measure, to the genealogies of regal dynasties and descriptions of the universe. However this may be, the machinery has been but loosely adhered to; and many of the Puránas, like the Vishnu, are referred to a different narrator.

An account is given, in the following work, 1 of a series of Pauránik compilations of which, in their present form, no vestige appears. Lomaharshana is said to have had six disciples, three of whom composed as many fundamental Samhitás, whilst he himself compiled a fourth. By a Samhitá is generally understood a 'collection' or 'compilation'. The Samhitás of the Vedas are collections of hymns and prayers belonging to them, arranged according to the judgment of some individual sage, who is, therefore, looked upon as the originator and teacher of each. The Samhitás of the Puránas, then, should be analogous compilations, attributed, respectively, to Mitrayu, Śámśapáyana, Akritabrańa, and Romaharshańa: no such Pauráńik Samhitás are now known. The substance of the four is said to be collected in the Vishnu Purána, which is, also, in another place, 2 itself called a Samhitá. But such compilations have not, as far as inquiry has yet proceeded, been discovered. The specification may be accepted as an indication of the Puránas' having existed in some other form, in which they are no longer met with; although it does not appear that the arrangement was incompatible with their existence as separate works; for the Vishnu Purána, which is our authority for the four Samhitás, gives us, also, the usual enumeration of the several Puránas.

There is another classification of the Puránas, alluded to in the Matsya Purána, and specified by the Padma

Purána, but more fully. It is not undeserving of notice, as it expresses the opinion which native writers entertain of the scope of the Puránas, and of their recognizing the subservience of these works to the dissemination of sectarian principles. Thus, it is said, in the Uttara Khańda of the Padma, * that the Puráńas, as well as other works, are divided into three classes, according to the qualities which prevail in them. Thus, the Vishńu, Náradíya, Bhágavata, Garuda, Padma, and Varáha Puráńas are Sáttwika or pure, from the predominance, in them, of the Sattwa quality, or that of goodness and purity. They are, in fact, Vaishnava Puráńas. The Matsya, Kúrma, Linga, Śiva, Skanda, and Agni Puránas are Támasa, or Puránas of darkness, from the prevalence of the quality of Tamas, 'ignorance', 'gloom'. They are, indisputably, Saiva Puránas. The third series, comprising the Brahmáńda, Brahma Vaivarta, Márkańdeya, Bhavishya, Vámana, and Brahma Puránas, are designated as Rájasa, 'passionate', from Rajas, the property of passion, which they are supposed to represent. The Matsya does not specify which are the Puránas that come under these designations, but remarks† that those in which the Máhátmya of Hari or Vishńu prevails are Sáttwika; those in which the legends of Agni or Śiva predominate are Támasa; and those which dwell most on the stories of Brahmá are Rájasa. I have elsewhere stated that I considered the Rájasa Puráńas to lean to the Śákta division of the Hindus, the worshippers of Sakti or the female principle; founding this opinion on the character of the legends which some of them contain, such as the Durgá Máhátmya, or celebrated legend on which the worship of Durgá or Kálí is especially founded, which is a principal episode of the Markandeya. The Brahma Vaivarta also devotes the greatest portion of its chapters to the celebration of Rádhá, the mistress of Krishna, and other female divinities. Colonel Vans Kennedy, however, objects to the application of the term Śákta to this last division of the Puránas; the worship of Śakti being the especial object of a different class of works, the Tantras; and no such form of worship being particularly inculcated in the Brahma Purána.2 This last argument is of weight in regard to the particular instance specified; and the designation of Sakti may not be correctly applicable to the whole class, although it is to some of the series: for there is no incompatibility in the advocacy of a Tántrika modification of the Hindu religion by any Purana; and it has, unquestionably, been practised in works known as Upapuránas. The proper appropriation of the third class of the Puránas, according to the Padma Purána, appears to be to the worship of Krishna, not in the character in which he is represented in the Vishnu and Bhagavata Puranas, -in which the incidents of his boyhood are only a portion of his biography, and in which the human character largely participates, at least in his riper years, -but as the infant Krishna, Govinda, Bála Gopála, the sojourner in Vrindávana, the companion of the cowherds and milkmaids, the lover of Rádhá, or as the juvenile master of the universe, Jagannátha. The term Rájasa, implying the animation of passion and enjoyment of sensual delights, is applicable not only to the character of the youthful divinity, but to those with whom his adoration in these forms seems to have originated, the Gosains of Gokul and Bengal, the followers and descendants of Vallabha and Chaitanya, the priests and proprietors of Jagannáth and Śrínáthdwár, who lead a life of affluence and indulgence, and vindicate, both by precept and practice, the reasonableness of the Rájasa property, and the congruity of temporal enjoyment with the duties of religion.1

The Puránas are uniformly stated to be eighteen in number. It is said that there are also eighteen Upapuránas or minor Puránas: but the names of only a few of these are specified in the least exceptionable authorities; and the greater number of the works is not procurable. With regard to the eighteen Puráńas, there is a peculiarity in their specification, which is proof of an interference with the integrity of the text, in some of them, at least; for each of them specifies the names of the whole eighteen. Now, the list could not have been complete whilst the work that gives it was unfinished; and in one only, therefore, the last of the series, have we a right to look for it. As, however, there are more last words than one, it is evident that the names must have been inserted in all except one, after the whole were completed. Which of the eighteen is the exception, and truly the last, there is no clue to discover; and the specification is, probably, an interpolation, in most, if not in all.

The names that are specified are commonly the same, and are as follows: 1. Bráhma, 2. Pádma, 3. Vaishńava, 4. Śaiva, 5. Bhágavata, 6. Náradíya, 7. Márkańdeya, 8. Ágneya, 9. Bhavishya, 10. Brahma Vaivarta, 11. Lainga, 12. Váráha, 13. Skánda, 14. Vámana, 15. Kaurma, 16. Mátsya, 17. Gáruda, 18. Brahmáńda.¹ This is from the twelfth book of the Bhágavata, and is the same as occurs in the Vishňu.² In other authorities there are a few variations. The list of the Kúrma Puráńa omits the Agni Puráńa, and substitutes the Váyu.* The Agni leaves out the Śiva, and inserts the Váyu. The Varáha omits the Garuda and Brahmáńda, and inserts the Váyu and Narasimha: in this last, it is singular. The Márkańdeya agrees with the Vishńu and Bhágavata, in omitting the Váyu. The Matsya, like the Agni, leaves out the Śiva.

¹ The names are put attributively; the noun substantive, Purána, being understood. Thus, Vaishnavam Puránam means the Purána of Vishnu; Śaivam Puránam, the Purána of Śiva; Bráhmam Puránam, the Purána of Brahma. It is equally correct, and more common, to use the two substantives in apposition, as Vishnu Purána, Śiva Purána, &c. In the original Sanskrit the nouns are compounded, as Vishnu-purána, &c.: but it has not been customary to combine them, in their European shape.

² Book III., Chapter VI.

Some of the Puráńas, as the Agni, Matsya,† Bhágavata,‡ and Padma, also particularize the number of stanzas which each of the eighteen contains. In one or two instances they disagree; but, in general, they concur. The aggregate is stated at 400,000 ślokas, or 1,600,000 lines. These are fabled to be but an abridgment; the whole amount being a krore or ten millions ^{*} Professor Wilson's MS. has मार्काइयमया जेयं; but four MSS. that I have consulted have मार्काइयमयाचेयं. And the latter reading is to be preferred. The Kúrma professes, at the end of its list of the Puráńas, to have enumerated eighteen; and, unless it names both the Váyu and the Agni, it enumerates but seventeen.

[†] The particulars from the Matsya will be found in the sequel.

[†] The computation of the Bhágavata, XII., 13, 4-8, is as follows: Brahma, 10,000 stanzas; Padma, 55,000; Vishňu, 23,000; Śiva, 24,000; Bhágavata, 18,000; Nárada, 25,000; Márkańdeya, 9,000; Agni, 15,400; Bhavishya, 14,500; Brahma-vaivarta, 18,000; Linga, 11,000; Varáha, 24,000; Skanda, 81,100; Vámana, 10,000; Kúrma, 17,000; Matsya, 14,000; Garuda, 19,000; Brahmáńda, 12,000. The total is 400,000.

The Bhágavata here calls the Agni and the Garuda by the names of Váhna and Sauparía.

The Devi-bhágavata substitutes, in place of the Śiva, the Váyu, and assigns to it 10,600 stanzas. Further, it gives to the Agni, 16,000; to the Skanda, 81,000; and to the Brahmáńda, 12,100.

The Revá-máhátmya also has, instead of Siva, Váyu, but reckons it at 24,000 couplets; and it likewise allows 16,000 to the Agni. To the Skanda it gives 84,000; and to the Brahmáhála, 12,200.

of stanzas, or even a thousand millions.* If all the fragmentary portions claiming, in various parts of India, to belong to the Puránas were admitted, their extent would much exceed the lesser, though it would not reach the larger, enumeration. The former is, however, as I have elsewhere stated, a quantity that an individual European scholar could scarcely expect to peruse with due care and attention, unless his whole time were devoted exclusively, for many years, to the task. Yet, without some such labour being achieved, it was clear, from the crudity and inexactness of all that had been hitherto published on the subject, with one exception,2 that sound views on the subject of Hindu mythology and tradition were not to be expected. Circumstances, which I have already explained in the paper in the Journal of the Royal Asiatic Society, referred to above, enabled me to avail myself of competent assistance, by which I made a minute abstract of most of the Puránas. In course of time I hope to place a tolerably copious and connected analysis of the whole eighteen before Oriental scholars, and, in the meanwhile, offer a brief notice of their several contents.

² I allude to the valuable work of Colonel Vans Kennedy, Researches into the Nature and Affinity of Ancient and Hindu Mythology. However much I may differ from that learned and industrious writer's conclusions, I must do him the justice to admit that he is the only author who has discussed the subject of the mythology of the Hindus on right principles, by drawing his materials from authentic sources.

In general, the enumeration of the Puránas is a simple nomenclature, with the addition, in some cases, of the number of verses; but to these the Matsya Purána* joins the mention of one or two circumstances peculiar to each, which, although scanty, are of value, as offering means of identifying the copies of the Puránas now found with those to which the Matsya refers, or of discovering a difference between the present and the past. I shall, therefore, prefix the passage descriptive of each Purána, from the Matsya. It is necessary to remark, however, that, in the comparison instituted between that description and the Purána as it exists, I necessarily refer to the copy or copies which I employed for the purpose of examination and analysis, and which were procured, with some trouble and cost, in Benares and Calcutta. In some instances my manuscripts have been collated with others from different parts of India; and the result has shown that with regard at least to the Brahma, Vishnu, Váyu, Matsya, Padma, Bhágavata, and Kúrma Puránas, the same works, in all essential respects, are generally current under the same appellations. Whether this is invariably the case, may be doubted; and further inquiry may possibly show that I have been obliged to content myself with mutilated or unauthentic works.¹ It is with this reservation, therefore, that I must be understood to speak of the concurrence or disagreement of any Purána with the notice of it which the Matsya Purána has preserved.

1. Brahma Purána. "That, the whole of which was formerly repeated by Brahmá to Maríchi, is called the Bráhma Purána, and contains ten thousand stanzas."2 In all the lists of the Puránas, the Brahma is placed at the head of the series, and is, thence, sometimes also entitled the Adi or 'first' Purána. It is also designated as the Saura; as it is, in great part, appropriated to the worship of Súrya, 'the sun'. There are, however, works bearing these names which belong to the class of Upapuránas, and which are not to be confounded with the Brahma. It is usually said, as above, to contain ten thousand ślokas; but the number actually occurring is between seven and eight thousand. There is a supplementary or concluding section, called the Brahmottara Puráńa, and which is different from a portion of the Skanda called the Brahmottara Khańda. which contains about three thousand stanzas more. But there is every reason to conclude that this is a distinct and unconnected work.

श्रह्मणाभिहितं पूर्वं यावन्माचं मरीचये। त्राह्मं तु दशसाहस्रं पुराणं परिकीर्तितम्॥

The immediate narrator of the Brahma Puráńa is Lomaharshańa, who communicates it to the Řishis or sages assembled at Naimishárańya, as it was originally revealed by Brahmá, not to Maríchi, as the Matsya affirms, but to Daksha, another of the patriarchs. Hence its denomination of the Brahma Puráńa.

The early chapters of this work give a description of the creation, an account of the Manwantaras, and the history of the solar and lunar dynasties to the time of Krishńa, in a summary manner, and in words which are common to it and several other Puráńas. A brief description of the universe succeeds; and then come a number of chapters relating to the holiness of Orissa, with its temples and sacred groves dedicated to the sun, to Śiva, and Jagannátha, the latter especially. These chapters are characteristic of this Puráńa, and show its main object to be the promotion of the worship of Krishńa as Jagannátha. To these particulars succeeds a life of Krishńa, which is, word for word, the same as that of the Vishńu Puráńa; and the compilation terminates with a particular detail of the mode in which Yoga or contemplative devotion, the object of which is still Vishńu, is to be performed. There is little, in this, which corresponds with the definition of a Pancha-lakshańa Puráńa; and the mention of the temples of Orissa, the date of the original construction of which is recorded, shows that it could not have been compiled earlier than the thirteenth or fourteenth century.

The Uttara Khańda of the Brahma Puráńa bears still more entirely the character of a Máhátmya or local legend; being intended to celebrate the sanctity of the Balajá river, conjectured to be the same as the Banás in Marwar. There is no clue to its date: but it is clearly modern; grafting personages and fictions of its own invention on a few hints from older authorities.²

2. Padma Puráńa. "That which contains an account of the period when the world was a golden lotos (padma), and of all the occurrences of that time, is, therefore, called the Pádma by the wise. It contains fifty-five thousand stanzas." The second Puráńa, in ever, is, of itself, sufficient, in my opinion, to determine the character and era of the compilation.

ग्रित्व यदा पद्ममभू जैर्गमचं जगत्। तद्गानाभ्यं तद्तपाद्ममिख्यते वृधिः॥ पाद्यं तत्पञ्चपञ्चाभ्रतसहस्राणीह कथ्यते। the usual lists, is always the Pádma, a very voluminous work, containing, according to its own statement, as well as that of other authorities, fifty-five thousand ślokas; an amount not far from the truth. These are divided amongst five books, or Khańdas; 1. The Srishfi Khańda or section on creation; 2. The Bhúmí Khańda, description of the earth; 3. The Swarga Khańda, chapter on heaven; 4. Pátála Khańda, chapter on the regions below the earth; and 5. the Uttara Khańda, last or supplementary chapter. There is also current a sixth division, the Kriyá Yoga Sára, a treatise on the practice of devotion.

The denominations of these divisions of the Padma Purána convey but an imperfect and partial notion of their contents. In the first, or section which treats of creation, the narrator is Ugraśravas, the Súta, the son of Lomaharshańa, who is sent, by his father, to the Ŕishis at Naimishárańya, to communicate to them the Purána, which, from its containing an account of the lotos (padma) in which Brahmá appeared at creation, is termed the Pádma, or Padma Purána. The Súta repeats what was originally communicated by Brahmá to Pulastya, and by him to Bhíshma. The early chapters narrate the cosmogony, and the genealogy of the patriarchal families, much in the same style, and often in the same words, as the Vishnu; and short accounts of the Manwantaras and regal dynasties: but these, which are legitimate Pauráńik matters, soon make way for new and unauthentic inventions, illustrative of the virtues of the lake of Pushkara or Pokher, in Ajmir, as a place of pilgrimage.

The Bhúmí Khańda, or section of the earth, defers any description of the earth until near its close; filling up one hundred and twenty-seven chapters with legends of a very mixed description, some ancient, and common to other Puránas, but the greater part peculiar to itself, illustrative of Tírthas, either figuratively so termed,—as a wife, a parent, or a Guru, considered as a sacred object,—or places to which actual pilgrimage should be performed.

The Swarga Khańda describes, in the first chapters, the relative positions of the Lokas or spheres above the earth; placing above all, Vaikuńtha, the sphere of Vishńu: an addition which is not warranted by what appears to be the oldest cosmology. Miscellaneous notices of some of the most celebrated princes then succeed, conformably to the usual narratives; and these are followed by rules of conduct for the several castes, and at different stages of life. The rest of the book is occupied by legends of a diversified description, introduced without much method or contrivance; a few of which, as Daksha's sacrifice, are of ancient date, but of which the most are original and modern.

The Pátála Khańda devotes a brief introduction to the description of Pátála, the regions of the snakegods. But, the name of Ráma having been mentioned, Sesha, who has succeeded Pulastya as spokesman, proceeds to narrate the history of Ráma, his descent, and his posterity; in which the compiler seems to have taken the poem of Kálidása, the Raghu Vamsa, for his chief authority. An originality of addition may be suspected, however, in the adventures of the horse despected.

tined by Ráma for an Aśwamedha, which form the subject of a great many chapters. When about to be sacrificed, the horse turns out to be a Brahman, condemned, by an imprecation of Durvásas, a sage, to assume the equine nature, and who, by having been sanctified by connexion with Ráma, is released from his metamorphosis, and despatched, as a spirit of light, to heaven. This piece of Vaishńava fiction is followed by praises of the Śrí Bhágavata, an account of Kŕishńa's juvenilities, and the merits of worshipping Vishńu. These accounts are communicated through a machinery borrowed from the Tantras: they are told by Sadáśiva to Párvatí, the ordinary interlocutors of Tántrika compositions.

The Uttara Khańda is a most voluminous aggregation of very heterogeneous matters; but it is consistent in adopting a decidedly Vaishnava tone, and admitting no compromise with any other form of faith. The chief subjects are first discussed in a dialogue between king Dilípa and the Muni Vasishtha; such as the merits of bathing in the mouth of Mágha, and the potency of the Mantra or prayer addressed to Lakshmí Náráyana. But the nature of Bhakti, faith in Vishnu-the use of Vaishnava marks on the body—the legends of Vishnu's Avatáras, and especially of Ráma—and the construction of images of Vishnu-are too important to be left to mortal discretion. They are explained by Siva to Párvatí, and wound up by the adoration of Vishnu by those divinities. The dialogue then reverts to the king and the sage; and the latter states why Vishnu is the only one of the triad entitled to respect; Siva being licentious, Brahmá arrogant, and Vishnu alone pure.

Vasishtha then repeats, after Siva, the Máhátmya of the Bhagavad Gítá; the merit of each book of which is illustrated by legends of the good consequences, to individuals, from perusing or hearing it. Other Vaishnava Máhátmyas occupy considerable portions of this Khanda, especially the Kárttika Máhátmya, or holiness of the month Kárttika; illustrated, as usual, by stories, a few of which are of an early origin, but the greater part modern, and peculiar to this Purána.

The Kriyá Yoga Sára is repeated, by Súta, to the Éishis, after Vyása's communication of it to Jaimini, in answer to an inquiry how religious merit might be secured in the Kali age, in which men have become incapable of the penances and abstraction by which final liberation was formerly to be attained. The answer is, of course, that which is intimated in the last book of the Vishúu Purána—personal devotion to Vishúu. Thinking of him, repeating his names, wearing his marks, worshipping in his temples, are a full substitute for all other acts of moral, or devotional, or contemplative, merit.

The different portions of the Padma Purána are, in all probability, as many different works, neither of which approaches to the original definition of a Purána. There may be some connexion between the three first portions, at least as to time: but there is no reason to consider them as of high antiquity. They specify the Jainas, both by name and practices; they talk of Mlechchhas, "barbarians", flourishing in India; they commend the use of the frontal and other Vaishnava marks; and they notice other subjects which, like these, are of no remote origin. The Pátála Khańda dwells copiously upon the Bhágavata, and is, consequently, posterior to it. The Uttara Khanda is intolerantly Vaishńava, and is, therefore, unquestionably modern. It enjoins the veneration of the Salagrama stone and Tulasí plant, the use of the Tapta-mudra, or stamping with a hot iron the name of Vishnu on the skin, and a variety of practices and observances undoubtedly no part of the original system. It speaks of the shrines of Śríranga and Venkatádri in the Dekhin, temples that have no pretension to remote antiquity; and it names Haripura on the Tungabhadrá, which is, in all likelihood, the city of Vijayanagara, founded in the middle of the fourteenth century. The Kriyá Yoga Sára is equally a modern, and, apparently, a Bengali composition. No portion of the Padma Purána is, probably, older than the twelfth century; and the last parts may be as recent as the fifteenth or sixteenth.1

3. Vishńu Puráńa. "That in which Paráśara, beginning with the events of the Varáha Kalpa, expounds all duties, is called the Vaishńava: and the learned know its extent to be twenty-three thousand stanzas." The third Purána of the lists is that which has been selected for translation, the Vishnu. It it unnecessary, therefore, to offer any general summary of its contents; and it will be convenient to reserve any remarks upon its character and probable antiquity, for a subsequent page. It may here be observed, however, that the actual number of verses contained in it falls far short of the enumeration of the Matsya, with which the Bhágavata concurs. Its actual contents are not seven thousand stanzas. All the copies - and, in this instance, they are not fewer than seven in number, - procured both in the east and in the west of India, agree; and there is no appearance of any part being wanting. There is a beginning, a middle, and an end, in both text and comment; and the work, as it stands, is, incontestably, entire. How is the discrepancy to be explained?

4. Váyu Puráňa. "The Puráňa in which Váyu has declared the laws of duty, in connexion with the Śweta Kalpa, and which comprises the Máhátmya of Rudra, is the Váyavíya Puráňa: it contains twenty-four thousand verses." The Śiva or Śaiva Puráňa is, as above remarked, omitted in some of the lists; and, in general, when that is the case, it is replaced by the Váyu or Váyavíya. When the Śiva is specified, as in the Bhágavata, then the Váyu is omitted; intimating the possible identity of these two works. This, indeed, is confirmed by the Matsya, which describes the Váyavíya Puráńa as characterized by its account of the greatness of Rudra or Śiva: and Bálam Bhatťa¹ mentions, that the Váyavíya is also called the Śaiva, though, according to some, the latter is the name of an Upapuráńa.* Colonel Vans Kennedy observes, that, in the west of India, the Śaiva is considered to be an Upa or 'minor' Puráńa.²

े श्वेतकल्पप्रसङ्गेन धर्मान्वायुरिहात्रवीत् । यनैतद्वायवीयं खादुद्रमाहात्यसंयुतम् ॥ चतुर्विभ्रत्सहसाणि पुराणं तदिहोच्यते ।

[†] This identity is distinctly asserted in the Revá-máhátmya, as follows:

Another proof that the same work is intended by the authorities here followed, the Bhágavata and Matsya, under different appellations, is their concurrence in the extent of the work; each specifying its verses to be twenty-four thousand. A copy of the Śiva Puráńa, of which an index and analysis have been prepared, does not contain more than about seven thousand. It cannot, therefore, be the Śiva Puráńa of the Bhágavata: and we may safely consider that to be the same as the Váyavíya of the Matsya.³

Regarding the first, described in § 113, Dr. Aufrecht observes: "De libro ipso, quem ad celebrandum cultum Laingicum scriptum esse vides, in praesentia nihil temere asseveraverim; exspectandum enim est, dum de Skandapuráñae parte, quae Śivamáhátmya appellatur, accuratiora andiamus. The Váyu Puráńa is narrated, by Súta, to the Řishis at Naimishárańya, as it was formerly told, at the same place, to similar persons, by Váyu; a repetition of circumstances not uncharacteristic of the inartificial style of this Puráńa. It is divided into four Pádas, termed, severally, Prakriyá, Upodgháta, Anushanga, and Upasamhára; a classification peculiar to this work. These are preceded by an index, or heads of chapters, in the manner of the Mahábhárata and Rámáyańa—another peculiarity.

The Prakrivá portion contains but a few chapters. and treats, chiefly, of elemental creation, and the first evolutions of beings, to the same purport as the Vishnu, but in a more obscure and unmethodical style. The Upodgháta then continues the subject of creation, and describes the various Kalpas or periods during which the world has existed; a greater number of which is specified by the Saiva, than by the Vaishnáva, Puránas. Thirty-three are here described, the last of which is the Śweta or 'white' Kalpa, from Śiva's being born, in it, of a white complexion. The genealogies of the patriarchs, the description of the universe, and the incidents of the first six Manwantaras are all treated of in this part of the work; but they are intermixed with legends and praises of Siva, as the sacrifice of Daksha, the Maheśwara Máhátmya, the Nílakańtha Stotra, and others. The genealogies, although, in the main, the same as those in the Vaishnava Puránas, present some variations. A long account of the Pitris or progenitors is also peculiar to this Purána; as are stories of some of the most celebrated Kishis who were engaged in the distribution of the Vedas.

The third division commences with an account of the seven Rishis and their descendants, and describes the origin of the different classes of creatures from the daughters of Daksha, with a profuse copiousness of nomenclature, not found in any other Purána. With exception of the greater minuteness of detail, the particulars agree with those of the Vishnu Purána. A chapter then occurs on the worship of the Pitris; another, on Tirthas or places sacred to them; and several, on the performance of Śráddhas, constituting the Śráddha Kalpa. After this comes a full account of the solar and lunar dynasties, forming a parallel to that in the following pages, with this difference, that it is, throughout, in verse, whilst that of our text, as noticed in its place, is, chiefly, in prose. It is extended, also, by the insertion of detailed accounts of various incidents, briefly noticed in the Vishnu, though derived, apparently, from a common original. The section terminates with similar accounts of future kings, and the same chronological calculations, that are found in the Vishnu.

The last portion, the Upasamhara, describes briefly the future Manwantaras, the measures of space and time, the end of the world, the efficacy of Yoga, and the glories of Sivapura, or the dwelling of Siva, with whom the Yogin is to be united. The manuscript concludes with a different history of the successive teachers of the Váyu Purána, tracing them from Brahmá to Váyu, from Váyu to Brihaspati, and from him, through various deities and sages, to Dwaipáyana and Súta.

The account given of this Purána in the Journal of the Asiatic Society of Bengal was limited to something less than half the work; as I had not then been able to procure a larger portion. I have now a more complete one of my own; and there are several copies in the East India Company's library, of the like extent. One, presented by His Highness the Guicowar, is dated Samvat 1540, or A. D. 1483, and is, evidently, as old as it professes to be. The examination I have made of the work confirms the view I formerly took of it; and, from the internal evidence it affords, it may, perhaps, be regarded as one of the oldest and most authentic specimens extant of a primitive Purána.

It appears, however, that we have not yet a copy of the entire Váyu Purána. The extent of it, as mentioned above, should be twenty-four thousand verses. The Guicowar MS. has but twelve thousand, and is denominated the Púrvárdha or first portion. My copy is of the like extent. The index also shows, that several subjects remain untold; as, subsequently to the description of the sphere of Siva, and the periodical dissolution of the world, the work is said to contain an account of a succeeding creation, and of various events that occurred in it, as the birth of several celebrated Rishis, including that of Vyása, and a description of his distribution of the Vedas; an account of the enmity between Vasishtha and Viśwamitra; and a Naimisharanya Mahátmya. These topics are, however, of minor importance, and can scarcely carry the Purána to the whole extent of the verses which it is said to contain. If the number is accurate, the index must still omit a considerable portion of the subsequent contents.

5. Śrí Bhágavata Puráńa. "That in which ample details of duty are described, and which opens with (an extract from) the Gáyatrí; that in which the death of the Asura Vritra is told, and in which the mortals and immortals of the Sáraswata Kalpa, with the events that then happened to them in the world, are related; that is celebrated as the Bhágavata, and consists of eighteen thousand verses." The Bhágavata is a work of great celebrity in India, and exercises a more direct and powerful influence upon the opinions and feelings of the people than, perhaps, any other of the Puránas. It is placed the fifth in all the lists; but the Padma Purána ranks it as the eighteenth, as the extracted substance of all the rest. According to the usual specification, it consists of eighteen thousand ślokas, distributed amongst three hundred and thirty-two chapters, divided into twelve Skandhas or books. It is named Bhágavata from its being dedicated to the glorification of Bhagavat or Vishnu.

The Bhágavata is communicated to the Rishis at Naimisháranya, by Súta, as usual: but he only repeats what was narrated by Śuka, the son of Vyása, to Parikshit, the king of Hastinápura, the grandson of Arjuna. Having incurred the imprecation of a hermit, by which he was sentenced to die of the bite of a venomous snake at the expiration of seven days, the king, in preparation for this event, repairs to the banks of the Ganges, whither also come the gods and sages, to witness his death. Amongst the latter is Śuka; and it is in reply to Parikshit's question, what a man should do who is about to die, that he narrates the Bhágavata, as he had heard it from Vyása: for nothing secures final happiness so certainly, as to die whilst the thoughts are wholly engrossed by Vishńu.

The course of the narration opens with a cosmogony, which, although, in most respects, similar to that of other Puráńas, is more largely intermixed with allegory and mysticism, and derives its tone more from the Vedánta than the Sánkhya philosophy. The doctrine of active creation by the Supreme, as one with Vásudeva, is more distinctly asserted, with a more decided enunciation of the effects being resolvable into Máyá or illusion. There are, also, doctrinal peculiarities highly characteristic of this Puráńa; amongst which is the assertion, that it was originally communicated by Brahmá to Nárada, that all men whatsoever, Hindus of every caste, and even Mlechchhas, outcasts or barbarians, might learn to have faith in Vásudeva.

In the third book, the interlocutors are changed to Maitreya and Vidura, the former of whom is the disciple, in the Vishńu Puráńa; the latter was the half-brother of the Kuru princes. Maitreya, again, gives an account of the Srishti-lílá or sport of creation, in a strain partly common to the Puráńas, partly peculiar; although he declares he learned it from his teacher Paráśara, at the desire of Pulastya: referring, thus, to the fabulous origin of the Vishńu Puráńa, and furnishing evidence of its priority. Again, however, the authority is changed; and the narrative is said to have been that which was communicated by Sesha to the Nágas. The creation of Brahmá is then described, and the divisions of time are explained. A very long and peculiar account is given of the Varáha incarnation of Visháu, which is followed by the creation of the Prajápatis and Swáyambhuva, whose daughter Devahúti is married to Kardama Říshi; an incident peculiar to this work, as is that which follows, of the Avatára of Visháu as Kapila the son of Kardama and Devahúti, the author of the Sánkhya philosophy, which he expounds, after a Vaisháva fashion, to his mother, in the last nine chapters of this section.

The Manwantara of Swáyambhuva, and the multiplication of the patriarchal families, are next described with some peculiarities of nomenclature, which are pointed out in the notes to the parallel passages of the Vishnu Purána. The traditions of Dhruva, Vena, Prithu, and other princes of this period, are the other subjects of the fourth Skandha, and are continued, in the fifth, to that of the Bharata who obtained emancipation. The details generally conform to those of the Vishnu Purána; and the same words are often employed; so that it would be difficult to determine which work had the best right to them, had not the Bhágavata itself indicated its obligations to the Vishnu. The remainder of the fifth book is occupied with the description of the universe; and the same conformity with the Vishnu. continues.

This is only partially the case with the sixth book, which contains a variety of legends of a miscellaneous description, intended to illustrate the merit of worshipping Vishńu. Some of them belong to the early stock; but some are, apparently, novel. The seventh book is, mostly, occupied with the legend of Prahláda. In the eighth, we have an account of the remaining Manwantaras; in which, as happening in the course of them, a variety of ancient legends are repeated, as the battle between the king of the elephants and an alligator, the churning of the ocean, and the dwarf and fish Avatáras. The ninth book narrates the dynasties of the Vaivaswata Manwantara, or the princes of the solar and lunar races to the time of Krishńa. The particulars conform, generally, with those recorded in the Vishńu.

The tenth book is the characteristic part of this Puráńa, and the portion upon which its popularity is founded. It is appropriated entirely to the history of Krishńa, which it narrates much in the same manner as the Vishńu, but in more detail; holding a middle place, however, between it and the extravagant prolixity with which the Hari Vamśa repeats the story. It is not necessary to particularize it further. It has been translated into, perhaps, all the languages of India, and is a favourite work with all descriptions of people.

The eleventh book describes the destruction of the Yádavas and death of Krishńa. Previous to the latter event, Krishńa instructs Uddhava in the performance of the Yoga; a subject consigned, by the Vishńu, to the concluding passages. The narrative is much ¹ A translation of the ninth, by Captain Fell, was published in Calcutta, in different numbers of the Monthly and Quarterly Magazine, in 1823 and 1824. the same, but something more summary than that of the Vishnu. The twelfth book continues the lines of the kings of the Kali age, prophetically, to a similar period as the Vishnu, and gives a like account of the deterioration of all things and their final dissolution. Consistently with the subject of the Purána, the serpent Takshaka bites Parikshit, and he expires: and the work should terminate; or the close might be extended to the subsequent sacrifice of Janamejaya, for the destruction of the whole serpent race. There is a rather awkwardly introduced description, however, of the arrangement of the Vedas and Puránas by Vyása, and the legend of Márkańdeya's interview with the infant Krishna, during a period of worldly dissolution. We then come to the end of the Bhágavata, in a series of encomiastic commendations of its own sanctity and efficacy to salvation.

Mr. Colebrooke observes, of the Bhágavata Puráńa: "I am, myself, inclined to adopt an opinion supported by many learned Hindus, who consider the celebrated Śrí Bhágavata as the work of a grammarian [Bopadeva], supposed to have lived about six hundred years ago." Colonel Vans Kennedy considers this an incautious admission; because "it is unquestionable that the number of the Puráńas have been always held to be eighteen; but, in most of the Puráńas, the names of the eighteen are enumerated, amongst which the Bhágavata is invariably included; and, consequently, if it were composed only six hundred years ago, the others must be of an equally modern date." Some of them are, no doubt, more recent; but, as already remarked, no weight can be attached to the specification of the eighteen names; for they are always complete: each Purána enumerates all. Which is the last? Which had the opportunity of naming its seventeen predecessors, and adding itself? The argument proves too much. There can be little doubt that the list has been inserted, upon the authority of tradition, either by some improving transcriber, or by the compiler of a work more recent than the eighteen genuine Puránas. The objection is also rebutted by the assertion, that there was another Purána to which the name applies, and which is still to be met with, the Deví Bhágavata.

For the authenticity of the Bhágavata is one of the few questions, affecting their sacred literature, which Hindu writers have ventured to discuss. The occasion is furnished by the text itself. In the fourth chapter of the first book, it is said that Vyása arranged the Vedas, and divided them into four, and that he then compiled the Itihása and Puráńas, as a fifth Veda. The Vedas he gave to Paila and the rest; the Itihása and Puráńas, to Lomaharshańa, the father of Súta. Then, reflecting that these works may not be accessible to women, Súdras, and mixed castes, he composed the Bhárata, for the purpose of placing religious knowledge within their reach. Still, he felt dissatisfied, and wandered, in much perplexity, along the banks of the Saraswatí, where his hermitage was situated, when Nárada paid him a visit. Having confided to him his secret and seemingly causeless dissatisfaction, Nárada suggested that it arose from his not having sufficiently dwelt, in the works he had finished, upon the merit of worshipping Vásudeva. Vyása at once admitted its truth, and found a remedy for his uneasiness in the composition of the Bhágavata, which he taught to Śuka, his son. Here, therefore, is the most positive assertion that the Bhágavata was composed subsequently to the Puránas, and given to a different pupil, and was not, therefore, one of the eighteen of which Romaharshana, the Súta, was, according to all concurrent testimonies, the depositary. Still, the Bhágavata is named amongst the eighteen Puránas, by the inspired authorities: and how can these incongruities be reconciled?

The principal point in dispute seems to have been started by an expression of Śridhara Śwámin, a commentator on the Bhágavata, who, somewhat incautiously, made the remark, that there was no reason to suspect that, by the term Bhágavata, any other work than the subject of his labours was intended. This was, therefore, an admission that some suspicions had been entertained of the correctness of the nomenclature, and that an opinion had been expressed, that the term belonged, not to the Śrí Bhágavata, but to the Deví Bhágavata: to a Śaiva, not a Vaishńava, composition. With whom doubts prevailed prior to Śrídhara Swámin, or by whom they were urged, does not appear; for, as far as we are aware, no works, anterior to his date, in which they are advanced have been met with. Subsequently, various tracts have been written on the subject. There are three in the library of the East India Company: the Durjana Mukha Chapetiká, 'A slap of the face for the vile', by Rámáśrama; the Durjana Mukha Mahá Chapetiká, * 'A great slap of the face for the wicked', by Kásínátha Bhatta; and the Durjana Mukha Padma Páduká, 'A slipper' for the same part of the same persons, by a nameless disputant. The first maintains the authenticity of the Bhágavata; the second asserts, that the Deví Bhágavata is the genuine Puráńa; and the third replies to the arguments of the first. There is, also, a work by Purushottama, entitled 'Thirteen arguments for dispelling all doubts of the character of the Bhágavata' (Bhágavata swarúpa vishaya śanká nirása trayodaśa); whilst Bálam Bhatta, a commentator on the Mitákshará, indulging in a dissertation on the meaning of the word Puráńa, adduces reasons for questioning the inspired origin of this Puráńa.

^{*} The postscript of this tract has Durjana-mukha-chapetiká. In the MS., Professor Wilson has noted, that it is referred to, in the Durjana-mukha-padma-páduká, under a longer title, that given in the text. Burnouf—who, in the preface to the first volume of his Bhágavata-puráňa, has translated and annotated the three treatises named above—remarks as follows on that reference: "Le traité auquel notre auteur fait allusion paraît être le même que celui que j'ai placé le troisième, et qui est consacré tout entier à prouver cette thèse, que quand les Purâńas parlent du Bhâgavata, c'est le Dêvîbhâgavata qu'ils entendent désigner, et non pas notre Çrî Bhâgavata, qui fait autorité pour les Vâichínavas. Cependant le passage sur lequel porte la présente note nomme ce traité: Un grand soufflet, etc.; ce qui ferait supposer qu'il existe deux traités de ce genre, dont l'un serait plus étendu que l'autre, et dont nous ne posséderions que le plus court, c'est-à-dire celui qui est traduit plus bas." P. LXXVII.

The chief arguments in favour of the authenticity of this Purána are, the absence of any reason why Bopadeva, to whom it is attributed, should not have put his own name to it; its being included in all lists of the Puránas, sometimes with circumstances that belong to no other Purána; and its being admitted to be a Purána, and cited as authority, or made the subject of comment, by writers of established reputation, of whom Śankara Achárya is one: and he lived long before Bopadeva. The reply to the first argument is rather feeble; the controversialists being unwilling, perhaps, to admit the real object, the promotion of new doctrines. It is, therefore, said, that Vyása was an incarnation of Náráyańa; and the purpose was to propitiate his favour. The insertion of a Bhágavata amongst the eighteen Puránas is acknowledged; but this, it is said, can be the Deví Bhágavata alone: for the circumstances apply more correctly to it than to the Vaishnava Bhágavata. Thus, a text is quoted, by Kásínátha, from a Purána-he does not state which-that says, of the Bhágavata, that it contains eighteen thousand verses, twelve books, and three hundred and thirty-two chapters. Kásínátha asserts that the chapters of the Śrí Bhágavata are three hundred and thirty-five, and that the numbers apply, throughout, only to the Deví Bhágavata. It is also said that the Bhágavata contains an account of the acquirement of holy knowledge by Hayagríva; the particulars of the Sáraswata Kalpa; a dialogue between Ambarísha and Śuka; and that it commences with the Gáyatrí, or, at least, a citation of it. These all apply to the Deví Bhágavata alone, except the last: but it also is more true of the Saiva than of the Vaishnava work; for the latter has only one word of the Gáyatrí, dhímahi, 'we meditate'; whilst the former to dhímahi adds, Yo nah prachodayát, 'who may enlighten us.' To the third argument it is, in the first place, objected, that the citation of the Bhágavata by modern writers is no test of its authenticity; and, with regard to the more ancient commentary of Sankara Áchárya, it is asked, "Where is it?" Those who advocate the sanctity of the Bhágavata reply: "It was written in a difficult style, and became obsolete, and is lost." "A very unsatisfactory plea", retort their opponents; "for we still have the works of Sankara, several of which are quite as difficult as any in the Sanskrit language." The existence of this comment, too, rests upon the authority of Mádhwa or Mádha-

The first three of these five verses are quoted, professedly from the Purahárhava, near the beginning of Chitsukha's Bhágavata-kathá-sangraha.

[&]quot; यन्यो (ष्टादश्साहस्रो द्वादश्स्त्रन्थसंमितः। हययीवब्रह्मविद्या यत्र वृत्रव्यस्या॥ गायच्या च समारसस्तद्दे भागवतं विदुः। स्त्रन्था द्वादश्र एवात्र क्रेणेन विहिताः शुभाः॥ द्वातिंश्विश्रतं पूर्णमध्यायाः परिकीर्तिताः।

va,* who, in a commentary of his own, asserts that he has consulted eight others. Now, amongst these is one by the monkey Hanumat; and, although a Hindu disputant may believe in the reality of such a composition, yet we may receive its citation as a proof that Mádhwa was not very scrupulous in the verification of his authorities.

There are other topics urged, in this controversy, on both sides, some of which are simple enough, some are ingenious: but the statement of the text is, of itself, sufficient to show, that, according to the received opinion, of all the authorities, of the priority of the eighteen Puránas to the Bhárata, it is impossible that the Śrí Bhágavata, which is subsequent to the Bhárata, should be of the number; and the evidence of style, the superiority of which to that of the Puranas in general is admitted by the disputants, is also proof that it is the work of a different hand. Whether the Deví Bhágavata have a better title to be considered as an original composition of Vyása, is equally questionable; but it cannot be doubted that the Śrí Bhágavata is the product of uninspired erudition. There does not seem to be any other ground than tradition for ascribing it to Bopadeva the grammarian: but there is no reason to call the tradition in question. Bopadeva flourished at the court of Hemádri, Raja of Devagiri, Deogur or Dowlutabad, and must, consequently, have lived prior to the conquest of that principality by the Mohammedans in the fourteenth century. The date of the twelfth century,* commonly assigned to him, is, probably, correct, and is that of the Bhágavata Puráńa.

6. Nárada or Náradíya Puráńa. "Where Nárada has described the duties which were observed in the Brihat Kalpa, that is called the Náradíya, having twenty-five thousand stanzas." If the number of verses be here correctly stated, the Puráńa has not fallen into my hands. The copy I have analysed contains not many more than three thousand ślokas. There is another work, which might be expected to be of greater extent, the Brihan Náradíya or great Nárada Puráńa; but this, according to the concurrence of three copies in my possession, and of five others in the Company's library, contains but about three thousand five hundred verses. It may be doubted, therefore, if the Nárada Puráńa of the Matsya exists.²

According to the Matsya, the Nárada Purána is related

² The description of Vishńu, translated by Colonel Vans Kennedy (Researches into the Nature and Affinity of Ancient and Hindu Mythology, p. 200) from the Náradíya Puráňa, occurs in my copy of the Břihan Náradíya. There is no Nárada Puráňa in the East India Company's library, though, as noticed in the text, several of the Břihan Náradíya. There is a copy of the Rukmángada Charitra, said to be a part of the Śrí Nárada Puráňa.

Touching Bopadeva and Hemádri, see Dr. Aufrecht's Catalog. Cod. Manuscript., &c., pp. 37 and 38.

^{*} Burnouf—Bhágavata-purána, Vol. I., Preface, p. LXIII., first note, and pp. XCVII. et seq.—would place Bopadeva in the second half of the thirteenth century.

I follow the western and southern pandits in preferring Bopadeva to Vopadeva, as the name is ordinarily exhibited.

by Nárada, and gives an account of the Břihat Kalpa. The Náradíya Puráňa is communicated, by Nárada, to the Říshis at Naimisháraňya, on the Gomatí river. The Břihan Náradíya is related to the same persons, at the same place, by Súta, as it was told by Nárada to Sanatkumára. Possibly, the term Břihat may have been suggested by the specification which is given in the Matsya: but there is no description, in it, of any particular Kalpa or day of Brahmá.

From a cursory examination of these Puránas it is very evident that they have no conformity to the definition of a Puráńa, and that both are sectarial and modern compilations, intended to support the doctrine of Bhakti or faith in Vishnu. With this view, they have collected a variety of prayers addressed to one or other form of that divinity; a number of observances and holydays connected with his adoration; and different legends, some, perhaps, of an early, others of a more recent, date, illustrative of the efficacy of devotion to Hari. Thus, in the Nárada, we have the stories of Dhruva and Prahláda; the latter told in the words of the Vishnu: whilst the second portion of it is occupied with a legend of Mohini, the will-born daughter of a king called Rukmángada; beguiled by whom, the king offers to perform for her whatever she may desire. She calls upon him either to violate the rule of fasting on the eleventh day of the fortnight, a day sacred to Vishnu, or to put his son to death; and he kills his son, as the lesser sin of the two. This shows the spirit of the work. Its date may also be inferred from its tenor; as such monstrous extravagancies in praise of Bhakti are, certainly, of modern origin. One limit it furnishes, itself; for it refers to Śuka and Parikshit, the interlocutors of the Bhágavata; and it is, consequently, subsequent to the date of that Puráńa. It is, probably, considerably later; for it affords evidence that it was written after India was in the hands of the Mohammedans. In the concluding passage it is said: "Let not this Puráńa be repeated in the presence of the 'killers of cows' and contemners of the gods." It is, possibly, a compilation of the sixteenth or seventeenth century.

The Brihan Náradíya is a work of the same tenor and time. It contains little else than panegyrical prayers addressed to Vishńu, and injunctions to observe various rites, and keep holy certain seasons, in honour of him. The earlier legends introduced are the birth of Márkańdeva, the destruction of Sagara's sons, and the dwarf Avatára; but they are subservient to the design of the whole, and are rendered occasions for praising Náráyana. Others, illustrating the efficacy of certain Vaishnava observances, are puerile inventions, wholly foreign to the more ancient system of Pauráńik fiction. There is no attempt at cosmogony, or patriarchal or regal genealogy. It is possible that these topics may be treated of in the missing stanzas: but it seems more likely that the Nárada Purána of the lists has little in common with the works to which its name is applied in Bengal and Hindusthán.

7. Márkańda or Márkańdeya Puráńa. "That Puráńa in which, commencing with the story of the birds that were acquainted with right and wrong, everything is narrated fully by Márkańdeya, as it was explained by holy sages, in reply to the question of the Muni, is called the Márkańdeya, containing nine thousand verses."1 This is so called from its being, in the first instance, narrated by Márkańdeya Muni, and, in the second place, by certain fabulous birds; thus far agreeing with the account given of it in the Matsva. That, as well as other authorities, specify its containing nine thousand stanzas; but my copy closes with a verse affirming that the number of verses recited by the Muni was six thousand nine hundred; and a copy in the East India Company's library has a similar specification. The termination is, however, somewhat abrupt; and there is no reason why the subject with which it ends should not have been carried on further. One copy in the Company's library, indeed, belonging to the Guicowar's collection, states, at the close, that it is the end of the first Khańda or section. If the Puráńa was ever completed, the remaining portion of it appears to be lost."

Jaimini, the pupil of Vyása, applies to Márkańdeya to be made acquainted with the nature of Vásudeva, and for an explanation of some of the incidents described in the Mahábhárata; with the ambrosia of which divine poem, Vyása, he declares, has watered the whole world: a reference which establishes the priority of the Bhárata to the Márkańdeya Puráńa, however incom-

Márkańdeya excuses himself, saying he has a religious rite to perform; and he refers Jaimini to some very sapient birds who reside in the Vindhya mountains; birds of a celestial origin, found, when just born, by the Muni Samíka, on the field of Kurukshetra, and brought up, by him, along with his scholars: in consequence of which, and by virtue of their heavenly descent, they became profoundly versed in the Vedas and a knowledge of spiritual truth. This machinery is borrowed from the Mahábhárata, with some embellishment. Jaimini, accordingly, has recourse to the birds, Pingáksha and his brethren, and puts to them the questions he had asked of the Muni: "Why was Vásudeva born as a mortal? How was it that Draupadí was the wife of the five Páńdus? Why did Baladeva do penance for Brahmanicide? And why were the children of Draupadí destroyed, when they had Krishna and Arjuna to defend them?" The answers to these inquiries occupy a number of chapters, and form a sort of supple-

^{*} In his account of the Márkańdeya-puráńa, Professor Banerjea says: "We cannot help noticing, in this place, the dignity imputed to the work under review. It is classed in the same category with the Vedas, and described as an immediate product from Brahmá's mouth. Although a Puráńa, it is not attributed to Vyása, whom other Śástras consider as the author of all works bearing that title. The Márkańdeya, however, does not acknowledge him as its composer, editor, or compiler. It claims equal honour, in this respect, with the Vedas themselves."

Again, with reference to the list spoken of in pp. XXIII. and XLV., supra: "As far as we have seen Bengal Manuscripts, the Markańdeya presents a singular exception to this hackneyed enumeration of the eighteen Puránas, and the celebration of Vyása's name as the author of them all. The Maithila manuscripts, as they are commonly called, are not so chaste." Ibid., Preface, pp. 15 and 16.

ment to the Mahábhárata; supplying, partly by invention, perhaps, and partly by reference to equally ancient authorities, the blanks left in some of its narrations.

Legends of Vritrásura's death, Baladeva's penance, Harischandra's elevation to heaven, and the quarrel between Vasishtha and Viśwamitra, are followed by a discussion respecting birth, death, and sin; which leads to a more extended description of the different hells than is found in other Puránas. The account of creation which is contained in this work is repeated, by the birds, after Márkańdeya's account of it to Kraushtuki, and is confined to the origin of the Vedas and patriarchal families, amongst whom are new characters, as Duhsaha and his wife Marshti, and their descendants; allegorical personages, representing intolerable iniquity and its consequences. There is then a description of the world, with, as usual to this Purána, several singularities, some of which are noticed in the following pages. This being the state of the world in the Swávambhuva Manwantara, an account of the other Manwantaras succeeds, in which the births of the Manus, and a number of other particulars, are peculiar to this work. The present or Vaivaswata Manwantara is very briefly passed over; but the next, the first of the future Manwantaras, contains the long episodical narrative of the actions of the goddess Durgá, which is the especial boast of this Purána, and is the text-book of the worshippers of Kálí, Chańdí, or Durgá, in Bengal. It is the Chandí Pátha, or Durgá Máhátmya, in which the victories of the goddess over different evil beings or Asuras are detailed with considerable power and spirit. It is read daily in the temples of Durgá, and furnishes the pomp and circumstance of the great festival of Bengal, the Durgá pújá, or public worship of that goddess.¹

After the account of the Manwantaras is completed, there follows a series of legends, some new, some old, relating to the Sun and his posterity; continued to Vaivaswata Manu and his sons, and their immediate descendants; terminating with Dama, the son of Narishyanta.² Of most of the persons noticed the work narrates particulars not found elsewhere.

This Purána has a character different from that of all the others. It has nothing of a sectarial spirit, little of a religious tone; rarely inserting prayers and invocations to any deity; and such as are inserted are brief and moderate. It deals little in precepts, ceremonial or moral. Its leading feature is narrative; and it presents an uninterrupted succession of legends, most of which, when ancient, are embellished with new circumstances, and, when new, partake so far of the spirit of the old, that they are disinterested creations of the imagination, having no particular motive, being designed to recommend no special doctrine or observance. Whether they are derived from any other source, or whether they are original inventions, it is not possible to ascertain. They are, most probably, for the greater part, at least, original; and the whole has been narrated in the compiler's own manner; a manner superior to that of the Puránas in general, with exception of the Bhágavata.

PREFACE.

It is not easy to conjecture a date for this Puráńa. It is subsequent to the Mahábhárata; but how long subsequent, is doubtful. It is, unquestionably, more ancient than such works as the Brahma, Padma, and Náradíya Puráńas; and its freedom from sectarial bias is a reason for supposing it anterior to the Bhágavata. At the same time, its partial conformity to the definition of a Puráńa, and the tenor of the additions which it has made to received legends and traditions, indicate a not very remote age; and, in the absence of any guide to a more positive conclusion, it may, conjecturally, be placed in the ninth or tenth century.

8. Agni Puráńa. "That Puráńa which describes the occurrences of the Ísána Kalpa, and was related by Agni to Vasishtha, is called the Ágneya. It consists of sixteen thousand stanzas." The Agni or Ágneya Puráńa derives its name from its having being communicated, originally, by Agni, the deity of fire, to the Muni Vasishtha, for the purpose of instructing him in the two-fold knowledge of Brahma. By him it was taught to Vyása, who imparted it to Súta; and the latter is represented as repeating it to the Rishis at Naimishárańya. Its contents are variously specified as sixteen thousand, fifteen thousand, or fourteen thousand, stanzas. The two copies which were employed by me contain about fifteen thousand ślokas. There are two, in the Company's library, which do not extend beyond twelve thousand verses; but they are, in many other respects, different from mine. One of them was written at Agra, in the reign of Akbar, in A. D. 1589.

The Agni Purána, in the form in which it has been obtained in Bengal and at Benares, presents a striking contrast to the Márkańdeya. It may be doubted if a single line of it is original. A very great proportion of it may be traced to other sources; and a more careful collation—if the task was worth the time it would require—would probably discover the remainder.

The early chapters of this Puráńa¹ describe the Avatáras, and, in those of Ráma and Kŕishńa, avowedly follow the Rámáyańa and Mahábhárata. A considerable portion is then appropriated to instructions for the performance of religious ceremonies; many of which belong to the Tántrika ritual, and are, apparently, transcribed from the principal authorities of that system. Some belong to mystical forms of Śaiva worship, little known in Hindusthán, though, perhaps, still practised in the south. One of these is the Díkshá or initiation of a novice; by which, with numerous ceremonies and invocations, in which the mysterious monosyllables of the Tantras are constantly repeated, the disciple is transformed into a living personation of Śiva, and receives, in that capacity, the homage of his Guru. Interspersed with these are chapters descriptive of the earth and of the universe, which are the same as those of the Vishnu Purána; and Máhátmyas or legends of holy places, particularly of Gayá. Chapters on the duties of kings and on the art of war then occur, which have the appearance of being extracted from some older work, as is, undoubtedly, the chapter on judicature,* which follows them, and which is the same as the text of the Mitákshará. Subsequent to these we have an account of the distribution and arrangement of the Vedas and Puránas, which is little else than an abridgment of the Vishnu; and, in a chapter on gifts, we have a description of the Puránas, which is precisely the same, and in the same situation, as the similar subject in the Matsya Purána. The genealogical chapters are meagre lists, differing, in a few respects, from those commonly received, as hereafter noticed, but unaccompanied by any particulars such as those recorded or invented in the Márkańdeya. The next subject is medicine, compiled, avowedly, but injudiciously, from the Sauśruta. A series of chapters on the mystic worship of Siva and Deví follows; and the work winds up with treatises on rhetoric, prosody, and grammar, according to the Sútras of Pingala and Páńini.

The cyclopædical character of the Agni Puráńa, as it is now described, excludes it from any legitimate claims to be regarded as a Puráńa, and proves that its origin cannot be very remote. It is subsequent to the Itihásas, to the chief works on grammar, rhetoric, and medicine, and to the introduction of the Tántrika worship of Deví. When this latter took place, is yet far from determined; but there is every probability that it dates long after the beginning of our era. The materials of the Agni Purána are, however, no doubt, of some antiquity. The medicine of Suśruta is considerably older than the ninth century; and the grammar of Pánini probably precedes Christianity. The chapters on archery and arms, and on regal administration, are also distinguished by an entirely Hindu character, and must have been written long anterior to the Mohammedan invasion. So far the Agni Purána is valuable, as embodying and preserving relics of antiquity, although compiled at a more recent date.

Colonel Wilford¹ has made great use of a list of kings derived from an appendix to the Agni Puráńa, which professes to be the sixty-third or last section. As he observes, it is seldom found annexed to the Puráńa. I have never met with it, and doubt its ever having formed any part of the original compilation. It would appear, from Colonel Wilford's remarks, that this list notices Mohammed as the institutor of an era: but his account of this is not very distinct. He mentions, explicitly, however, that the list speaks of Śáliváhana and Vikramáditya: and this is quite sufficient to establish its character. The compilers of the Puráńas were not such bunglers as to bring within their chro-nology so well known a personage as Vikramáditya. There are, in all parts of India, various compilations ascribed to the Puráńas, which never formed any portion of their contents, and which, although offering, sometimes, useful local information, and valuable as preserving popular traditions, are not, in justice, to be confounded with the Puráńas, so as to cause them to be charged with even more serious errors and anachronisms than those of which they are guilty.

The two copies of this work in the library of the East India Company appropriate the first half to a description of the ordinary and occasional observances of the Hindus, interspersed with a few legends. The latter half treats exclusively of the history of Ráma.

9. Bhavishya Puráńa. "The Puráńa in which Brahmá, having described the greatness of the sun, explained to Manu the existence of the world, and the characters of all created things, in the course of the Aghora Kalpa, that is called the Bhavishya; the stories being, for the most part, the events of a future period. It contains fourteen thousand five hundred stanzas." This Puráńa, as the name implies, should be a book of prophecies, foretelling what will be (bhavishyati), as the Matsya Puráńa intimates. Whether such a work exists, is doubtful. The copies, which appear to be entire, and of which there are three in the library of the East India Company, agreeing, in their contents, with two in my possession, contain about seven thousand stanzas. There is another work, entitled the Bhavishyottara, as if it was a continuation or supplement of the former, containing, also, about seven thousand verses: but the subjects of both these works are but to a very imperfect degree analogous to those to which the Matsya alludes.¹

The Bhavishya Puráńa, as I have it, is a work in a hundred and twenty-six short chapters, repeated by Sumantu to Śatáníka, a king of the Páńdu family. He notices, however, its having originated with Swayambhu or Brahmá, and describes it as consisting of five parts; four dedicated, it should seem, to as many deities, as they are termed, Bráhma, Vaishńava, Śaiva, and Twáshfra; whilst the fifth is the Pratisarga or repeated creation. Possibly, the first part only may have come into my hands; although it does not so appear by the manuscript.

Whatever it may be, the work in question is not a Puráńa. The first portion, indeed, treats of creation; but it is little else than a transcript of the words of the first chapter of Manu. The rest is entirely a manual of religious rites and ceremonies. It explains the ten Sańskáras or initiatory rites; the performance of the Sandhyá; the reverence to be shown to a Guru; the duties of the different Áśramas and castes; and enjoins a number of Vratas or observances of fasting and the like, appropriate to different lunar days. A few legends enliven the series of precepts. That of the sage Chyavana is told at considerable length, taken, chiefly, from the Mahábhárata. The Nága Panchamí, or fifth lunation sacred to the serpent-gods, gives rise to a description of different sorts of snakes. After these, which occupy about one third of the chapters, the remainder of them conform, in subject, to one of the topics referred to by the Matsya. They chiefly represent conversations between Krishna, his son Sámba,—who had become a leper by the curse of Durvásas,-Vasishtha, Nárada, and Vyása, upon the power and glory of the Sun, and the manner in which he is to be worshipped. There is some curious matter in the last chapters, relating to the Magas, silent worshippers of the sun, from Sákadwipa; as if the compiler had adopted the Persian term Magh, and connected the fire-worshippers of Iran with those of India. This is a subject, however, that requires further investigation.

The Bhavishyottara is, equally with the preceding, a sort of manual of religious offices; the greater portion being appropriated to Vratas, and the remainder, to the forms and circumstances with which gifts are to be presented. Many of the ceremonies are obsolete, or are observed in a different manner, as the Rathayátrá or car-festival, and the Madanotsava or festival of spring. The descriptions of these throw some light upon the public condition of the Hindu religion at a period probably prior to the Mohammedan conquest. The different ceremonies are illustrated by legends, which are, sometimes, ancient; as, for instance, the destruction of the god of love by Siva, and his thence becoming Ananga, the disembodied lord of hearts. The work is supposed to be communicated by Krishna to Yudhishthira, at a great assemblage of holy persons at the coronation of the latter, after the conclusion of the Great War.

10. Brahma Vaivarta Puráńa. "That Puráńa which is related by Sávarńi to Nárada, and contains the account of the greatness of Krishńa, with the occurrences of the Rathantara Kalpa, where, also, the story of Brahmavaráha is repeatedly told, is called the Brahma Vaivarta, and contains eighteen thousand stanzas." The account here given of the Brahma Vaivarta Puráńa agrees with its present state, as to its extent. The copies rather exceed than fall short of eighteen thousand stanzas. It also correctly represents its comprising a Máhátmya or legend of Krishńa; but it is very doubtful, nevertheless, if the same work is intended.

The Brahma Vaivarta, as it now exists, is narrated, not by Sávarńi, but the Kishi Náráyańa, to Nárada, by whom it is communicated to Vyása: he teaches it to Súta; and the latter repeats it to the Kishis at Naimishárańya. It is divided into four Khańdas or books, the Bráhma, Prakřiti, Gańeśa, and Krishńa Janma Khańdas; dedicated, severally, to describe the acts of Brahmá, Deví, Gańeśa, and Krishńa; the latter, however, throughout absorbing the interest and importance of the work. In none of these is there any account of the Varáha Avatára of Vishnu, - which seems to be intended by the Matsya, -nor any reference to a Rathantara Kalpa. It may also be observed, that, in describing the merit of presenting a copy of this Purána, the Matsya adds: "Whoever makes such gift is honoured in the Brahma-loka"; * a sphere which is of very inferior dignity to that to which a worshipper of Krishna is taught to aspire by this Purana. The character of the work is, in truth, so decidedly sectarial, and the sect to which it belongs so distinctly marked,that of the worshippers of the juvenile Krishna and Rádhá, a form of belief of known modern origin,-that it can scarcely have found a notice in a work to which, like the Matsya, a much more remote date seems to belong. Although, therefore, the Matsya may be received in proof of there having been a Brahma Vaivarta Purána at the date of its compilation, dedicated especially to the honour of Krishna, yet we cannot credit the possibility of its being the same we now possess.

Although some of the legends believed to be ancient are scattered through the different portions of this Purána, yet the great mass of it is taken up with tiresome descriptions of Vrindávana and Goloka, the dwellings of Krishna on earth and in heaven; with endless repetitions of prayers and invocations addressed to him; and with insipid descriptions of his person and sports, and the love of the Gopís and of Rádhá towards him. There are some particulars of the origin of the artificer castes,—which is of value, because it is cited as authority in matters affecting them,—contained in the Bráhma Khańda; and, in the Prakŕiti and Gańeśa Khańdas, are legends of those divinities, not wholly, perhaps, modern inventions, but of which the source has not been traced. In the life of Kŕishńa, the incidents recorded are the same as those narrated in the Vishńu and the Bhágavata; but the stories, absurd as they are, are much compressed, to make room for original matter still more puerile and tiresome. The Brahma Vaivarta has not the slightest title to be regarded as a Puráńa.¹

11. Linga Puráńa. "Where Maheśwara, present in the Agni Linga, explained (the objects of life) virtue, wealth, pleasure, and final liberation at the end of the Agni Kalpa," that Puráńa, consisting of eleven thousand stanzas, was called the Lainga by Brahmá himself."²

The Linga Purána conforms, accurately enough, to this description. The Kalpa is said to be the Iśána: but this is the only difference. It consists of eleven thousand stanzas. It is said to have been originally composed by Brahmá; and the primitive Linga is a pillar of radiance, in which Maheśwara is present. The work is, therefore, the same as that referred to by the Matsya.

A short account is given, in the beginning, of elemental and secondary creation, and of the patriarchal families; in which, however, Siva takes the place of Vishnu, as the indescribable cause of all things. Brief accounts of Siva's incarnations and proceedings in different Kalpas next occur, offering no interest, except as characteristic of sectarial notions. The appearance of the great fiery Linga takes place, in the interval of a creation, to separate Vishnu and Brahma, who not only dispute the palm of supremacy, but fight for it; when the Linga suddenly springs up, and puts them both to shame; as, after travelling upwards and downwards for a thousand years in each direction, neither can approach to its termination. Upon the Linga the sacred monosyllable Om is visible; and the Vedas proceed from it, by which Brahmá and Vishńu become enlightened, and acknowledge and eulogize the superior might and glory of Siva.

A notice of the creation in the Padma Kalpa then follows; and this leads to praises of Siva by Vishńu and Brahmá. Siva repeats the story of his incarnations, twenty-eight in number; intended as a counterpart, no doubt, to the twenty-four Avatáras of Vishńu, as described in the Bhágavata; and both being amplifications of the original ten Avatáras, and of much less merit as fictions. Another instance of rivalry occurs in the legend of Dadhíchi, a Muni, and worshipper of Siva. In the Bhágavata, there is a story of Ambarísha being defended against Durvásas by the discus of Vishńu, against which that Saiva sage is helpless. Here, Vishńu hurls his discus at Dadhíchi: but it falls, blunted, to the ground; and a conflict ensues, in which Vishńu and his partisans are all overthrown by the Muni.

A description of the universe, and of the regal dynasties of the Vaivaswata Manwantara to the time of Kŕishňa, runs through a number of chapters, in substance, and, very commonly, in words, the same as in other Puránas; after which the work resumes its proper character, narrating legends, and enjoining rites, and reciting prayers, intending to do honour to Siva under various forms. Although, however, the Linga holds a prominent place amongst them, the spirit of the worship is as little influenced by the character of the type as can well be imagined. There is nothing like the phallic orgies of antiquity: it is all mystical and spiritual. The Linga is twofold, external and internal. The ignorant. who need a visible sign, worship Siva through a 'mark' or 'type' - which is the proper meaning of the word 'Linga'-of wood, or stone; but the wise look upon this outward emblem as nothing, and contemplate, in their minds, the invisible, inscrutable type, which is Siva himself. Whatever may have been the origin of this form of worship in India, the notions upon which it was founded, according to the impure fancies of European writers, are not to be traced in even the Saiva Puránas.

Data for conjecturing the era of this work are defective. But it is more a ritual than a Purána; and the Pauránik chapters which it has inserted, in order to keep up something of its character, have been, evidently, borrowed for the purpose. The incarnations of Śiva, and their 'pupils', as specified in one place, and the importance attached to the practice of the Yoga, render it possible that, under the former, are intended those teachers of the Śaiva religion who belong to the Yoga school,¹ which seems to have flourished about the eighth or ninth centuries. It is not likely that the work is earlier: it may be considerably later. It has preserved, apparently, some Śaiva legends of an early date; but the greater part is ritual and mysticism of comparatively recent introduction.

12. Varáha Puráńa. "That in which the glory of the great Varáha is predominant, as it was revealed to Earth by Vishńu, in connexion, wise Munis, with the Mánava Kalpa, and which contains twenty-four thousand verses, is called the Váráha Puráńa."2

It may be doubted if the Varáha Puráńa of the present day is here intended. It is narrated by Vishńu as Varáha, or in the boar incarnation, to the personified Earth. Its extent, however, is not half that specified; little exceeding ten thousand stanzas. It furnishes, also, itself, evidence of the prior currency of some other work, similarly denominated; as, in the description of Mathurá contained in it, Sumantu, a Muni, is made to observe: "The divine Varáha in former times expounded a Puráńa, for the purpose of solving the perplexity of Earth."

Nor can the Varáha Puráha be regarded as a Puráha agreeably to the common definition; as it contains but a few scattered and brief allusions to the creation of the world and the reign of kings: it has no detailed genealogies, either of the patriarchal or regal families, and no account of the reigns of the Manus. Like the Linga Purána, it is a religious manual, almost wholly occupied with forms of prayer and rules for devotional observances, addressed to Vishnu; interspersed with legendary illustrations, most of which are peculiar to itself, though some are taken from the common and ancient stock. Many of them, rather incompatibly with the general scope of the compilation, relate to the history of Śiva and Durgá.1 A considerable portion of the work is devoted to descriptions of various Tírthas, places of Vaishnava pilgrimage; and one of Mathurá enters into a variety of particulars relating to the shrines of that city, constituting the Mathurá Máhátmya.

In the sectarianism of the Varáha Puráńa there is no leaning to the particular adoration of Krishńa; nor are the Rathayátrá and Janmáshtamí included amongst the observances enjoined. There are other indications of its belonging to an earlier stage of Vaishńava worship; and it may, perhaps, be referred to the age of Rámánuja, the early part of the twelfth century.

¹ One of these is translated by Colonel Vans Kennedy, the origin of the three Śaktis or goddesses, Saraswatí, Lakshmí, and Párvatí. Researches into the Nature and Affinity of Ancient and Hindu Mythology, p. 209. The Tri Śakti Máhátmya occurs, as he gives it, in my copy, and is, so far, an indication of the identity of the Varáha Purána in the different MSS.

13. Skanda Puráńa. "The Skánda Puráńa is that in which the six-faced deity (Skanda) has related the events of the Tatpurusha Kalpa, enlarged with many tales, and subservient to the duties taught by Maheśwara. Is is said to contain eighty-one thousand one hundred stanzas: so it is asserted amongst mankind." 1

It is uniformly agreed that the Skanda Purána, in a collective form, has no existence; and the fragments, in the shape of Samhitás, Khandas, and Mahatmyas, which are affirmed, in various parts of India, to be portions of the Purána, present a much more formidable mass of stanzas than even the immense number of which it is said to consist. The most celebrated of these portions, in Hindusthán, is the Kásí Khańda, a very minute description of the temples of Siva in or adjacent to Benares, mixed with directions for worshipping Maheśwara, and a great variety of legends explanatory of its merits and of the holiness of Kásí. Many of them are puerile and uninteresting; but some are of a higher character. The story of Agastya records, probably, in a legendary style, the propagation of Hinduism in the south of India; and, in the history of Divodása, king of Kásí, we have an embellished tradition of the temporary depression of the worship of Siva, even in its metropolis, before the ascendancy of the followers of Buddha.2 There is every reason to believe the greater part of the contents of the Kásí Khańda anterior to the first attack upon Benares by Mahmud of Ghizni. The Kásí Khańda alone contains fifteen thousand stanzas.

Another considerable work ascribed, in Upper India, to the Skanda Purána, is the Utkala Khanda, giving an account of the holiness of Orissa, and the Kshetra of Purushottama or Jagannátha. The same vicinage is the site of temples, once of great magnificence and extent, dedicated to Siva, as Bhuvaneśwara, which forms an excuse for attaching an account of a Vaishnava Tírtha to an eminently Saiva Purána. There can be little doubt, however, that the Utkala Khanda is unwarrantably included amongst the progeny of the parent work. Besides these, there is a Brahmottara Khańda, a Revá Khańda, a Śiva Rahasya Khańda, a Himavat Khańda, and others. Of the Samhitás the chief are the Súta Samhitá, Sanatkumára Samhitá, Saura Samhitá, and Kapila Samhitá: there are several other works denominated Samhitás. The Máhátmyas are more numerous still. According to the Súta Samhitá, as quoted by Colonel Vans Kennedy,2 the Skanda

Brown, of the Civil Service of Madras, the Samhitás are seven, the Khandas, twelve, besides parts denominated Gítá, Kalpa, Stotra, &c. In the collection of Colonel Mackenzie, amongst the Máhátmyas, thirty-six are said to belong to the Skanda Purána. Vol. I., p. 61. PREFACE.

Purána contains six Samhitás, five hundred Khandas, and five hundred thousand stanzas; more than is even attributed to all the Puránas. He thinks, judging from internal evidence, that all the Khańdas and Samhitás may be admitted to be genuine, though the Máhátmyas have rather a questionable appearance. Now, one kind of internal evidence is the quantity; and, as no more than eighty-one thousand one hundred stanzas have ever been claimed for it, " all in excess above that amount must be questionable. But many of the Khańdas, the Káśi Khańda, for instance, are quite as local as the Máhátmyas; being legendary stories relating to the erection and sanctity of certain temples, or groups of temples, and to certain Lingas; the interested origin of which renders them, very reasonably, objects of suspicion. In the present state of our acquaintance with the reputed portions of the Skanda Purána, my own views of their authenticity are so opposed to those entertained by Colonel Vans Kennedy, that, instead of admitting all the Samhitás and Khańdas to be genuine, I doubt if any one of them was ever a part of the Skanda Purána.

14. Vámana Purána. "That in which the four-faced Brahmá taught the three objects of existence, as subservient to the account of the greatness of Trivikrama, which treats, also, of the Śiva Kalpa, and which consists of ten thousand stanzas, is called the Vámana Purána."

^{*} But see the end of my third note in p. XXIV., supra.

[†] Professor Wilson here omitted a word of two syllables -, probably,

The Vámana Purána contains an account of the dwarf incarnation of Vishnu: but it is related by Pulastya to Nárada, and extends to but about seven thousand stanzas. Its contents scarcely establish its claim to the character of a Purána.¹

There is little or no order in the subjects which this work recapitulates, and which arise out of replies made by Pulastya to questions put, abruptly and unconnectedly, by Nárada. The greater part of them relate to the worship of the Linga; a rather strange topic for a Vaishnava Purána, but engrossing the principal part of the compilation. They are, however, subservient to the object of illustrating the sanctity of certain holy places; so that the Vámana Purána is little else than a succession of Máhátmyas. Thus, in the opening, almost, of the work occurs the story of Daksha's sacrifice, the object of which is to send Siva to Pápamochana Tírtha, at Benares, where he is released from the sin of Brahmanicide. Next comes the story of the burning of Kámadeva, for the purpose of illustrating the holiness of a Siva-linga at Kedáreśwara in the Himalaya, and of Badarikáśrama. The larger part of the work consists of the Saro-máhátmya, or legendary exemplifications of the holiness of Sthánu Tírtha; that is, of the sanctity of various Lingas and certain pools at Thanesar and Kurukhet, the country north-west from Delhi. There are some stories, also, relating to the holiness of the Godávarí river: but the general site of the legends is in Hindusthán. In the course of these accounts, we have a long narrative of the marriage of Śiva with Umá, and the birth of Kárttikeya. There are a few brief allusions to creation and the Manwantaras; but they are merely incidental; and all the five characteristics of a Purána are deficient. In noticing the Swárochisha Manwantara, towards the end of the book, the elevation of Bali as monarch of the Daityas, and his subjugation of the universe, the gods included, are described; and this leads to the narration that gives its title to the Purána, the birth of Krishna as a dwarf, for the purpose of humiliating Bali by fraud, as he was invincible by force. The story is told as usual; but the scene is laid at Kurukshetra.

A more minute examination of this work than that which has been given to it, might, perhaps, discover some hint from which to conjecture its date. It is of a more tolerant character than the Puránas, and divides its homage between Siva and Vishnu with tolerable impartiality. It is not connected, therefore, with any sectarial principles, and may have preceded their introduction. It has not, however, the air of any antiquity; and its compilation may have amused the leisure of some Brahman of Benares three or four centuries ago.

15. Kúrma Puráńa. "That in which Janárdana, in the form of a tortoise, in the regions under the earth, explained the objects of life—duty, wealth, pleasure, and liberation—in communication with Indradyumna and the Rishis in the proximity of Śakra, which refers to the Lakshmí Kalpa, and contains seventeen thousand stanzas, is the Kúrma Puráńa."¹

In the first chapter of the Kúrma Puráńa, it gives an account of itself, which does not exactly agree with this description. Súta, who is repeating the narration, is made to say to the Kishis: "This most excellent Kaurma Puráńa is the fifteenth. Samhitás are fourfold, from the variety of the collections. The Bráhmí, Bhágavatí, Saurí, and Vaishňaví are well known as the four Samhitás which confer virtue, wealth, pleasure, and liberation. This is the Bráhmí Samhitá, conformable to the four Vedas; in which there are six thousand ślokas; and, by it, the importance of the four objects of life, O great sages, holy knowledge and Parameśwara is known."* There is an irreconcilable difference in this specification of the number of stanzas and that given above. It is not very clear what is meant by a Samhitá, as here used. A Samhitá, as observed above (p. XIX.), is something different from a Puráńa. It may be an assemblage of prayers and legends, extracted, professedly, from a Purána, but is not, usually, applicable to the original. The four Samhitás here specified refer rather to their religious character than to their connexion with any specific work; and, in fact, the same terms are applied to what are called Samhitás of the Skanda. In this sense, a Purána might be also a Samhitá; that is, it might be an assemblage of formulæ and legends belonging to a division of the Hindu system; and the work in question, like the Vishnu Purána, does adopt both titles. It says: "This is the excellent Kaurma Purána, the fifteenth (of the series)." And again: "This is the Bráhmí Samhitá." At any rate, no other work has been met with pretending to be the Kúrma Purána.

With regard to the other particulars specified by the Matsya, traces of them are to be found. Although, in two accounts of the traditional communication of the Puráńa, no mention is made of Vishńu as one of the teachers, yet Súta repeats, at the outset, a dialogue between Vishńu, as the Kúrma, and Indradyumna, at the time of the churning of the ocean; and much of the subsequent narrative is put into the mouth of the former.

The name, being that of an Avatára of Vishńu, might lead us to expect a Vaishńava work: but it is always, and correctly, classed with the Śaiva Puráńas; the greater portion of it inculcating the worship of Śiva and Durgá. It is divided into two parts, of nearly equal length. In the first part, accounts of the creation, of the Avatáras of Vishnu, of the solar and lunar dynasties of the kings to the time of Krishna, of the universe, and of the Manwantaras, are given, in general in a summary manner, but, not unfrequently, in the words employed in the Vishnu Purána. With these are blended hymns addressed to Maheśwara by Brahmá and others; the defeat of Andhakásura by Bhairava; the origin of four Śaktis, Maheśwari, Śivá, Satí, and Haimavatí, from Siva; and other Saiva legends. One chapter gives a more distinct and connected account of the incarnations of Siva, in the present age, than the Linga; and it wears, still more, the appearance of an attempt to identify the teachers of the Yoga school with personations of their preferential deity. Several chapters form a Kásí Máhátmya, a legend of Benares. In the second part there are no legends. It is divided into two parts, the Íśwara Gítá¹ and Vyása Gitá. In the former, the knowledge of god, that is, of Siva, through contemplative devotion, is taught. In the latter, the same object is enjoined through works, or observance of the ceremonies and precepts of the Vedas.

The date of the Kúrma Puráńa cannot be very remote; for it is, avowedly, posterior to the establishment of the Tántrika, the Sákta, and the Jaina sects. In the twelfth chapter it is said: "The Bhairava, Váma, Árhata, and Yámala Sástras are intended for delusion." There is no reason to believe that the Bhairava and Yámala Tantras are very ancient works, or that the practices of the left-hand Sáktas, or the doctrines of Arhat or Jina, were known in the early centuries of our era.

16. Matsya Puráńa. "That in which, for the sake of promulgating the Vedas, Vishńu, in the beginning of a Kalpa, related to Manu the story of Narasińha and the events of seven Kalpas; that, O sages, know to be the Mátsya Puráńa, containing twenty thousand stanzas."

We might, it is to be supposed, admit the description which the Matsya gives of itself to be correct; and yet, as regards the number of verses, there seems to be a misstatement. Three very good copies—one in my possession, one in the Company's library, and one in the Radeliffe library—concur in all respects, and in containing no more than between fourteen and fifteen thousand stanzas. In this case the Bhágavata is nearer the truth, when it assigns to it fourteen thousand. We may conclude, therefore, that the reading of the passage is, in this respect, erroneous.* It is correctly said, that

श्रुतीनां यन कल्पादी प्रवृत्त्वर्थं जनार्दनः। मत्यक्षेण मनवे नरसिंहस्य वर्णनम्॥ अधिकत्यात्रवीत्यप्तकल्पवृत्तं मुनित्रताः। तत्मात्स्यमिति जानीधं सहस्राख्य विंग्रति॥

^{*} Two out of the four I. O. L. MSS. of the Matsya-purána—see the last line of the Sanskrit quoted in this page—give REATIN TOTAL "fourteen thousand"; and the others exhibit evident corruptions of the same reading. That this reading is to be preferred, we have, besides the evidence, adduced by Professor Wilson, of the Bhagavata-purana, that of the Devi-bhagavata and Revá-mahátmya, the subjects of the Purána were communicated by Vishnu, in the form of a fish, to Manu.

The Purána, after the usual prologue of Súta and the Rishis, opens with the account of the Matsya or 'fish' Avatára of Vishnu, in which he preserves a king, named Manu, with the seeds of all things, in an ark, from the waters of that inundation which, in the season of a Pralaya, overspreads the world. This story is told in the Mahábhárata, with reference to the Matsya as its authority; from which it might be inferred, that the Purána was prior to the poem. This, of course, is consistent with the tradition that the Puránas were first composed by Vyása. But there can be no doubt that the greater part of the Mahábhárata is much older than any extant Purána. The present instance is, itself, a proof; for the primitive simplicity with which the story of the fish Avatára is told in the Mahábhárata, is of a much more antique complexion than the mysticism and extravagance of the actual Matsya Purána. In the former, Manu collects the seeds of existing things in the ark; it is not said how: in the latter, he brings them all together by the power of Yoga. In the latter, the great serpents come to the king, to serve as cords wherewith to fasten the ark to the horn of the fish: in the former, a cable made of ropes is more intelligibly employed for the purpose.

Whilst the ark floats, fastened to the fish, Manu enters into conversation with him; and his questions and the replies of Vishńu form the main substance of the compilation. The first subject is the creation, which is that of Brahmá and the patriarchs. Some of the details are the usual ones; others are peculiar, especially those relating to the Pitris or progenitors. The regal dynasties are next described; and then follow chapters on the duties of different orders. It is in relating those of the householder, in which the duty of making gifts to Brahmans is comprehended, that we have the specification of the extent and subjects of the Puránas. It is meritorious to have copies made of them, and to give these away on particular occasions. Thus, it is said, of the Matsya: "Whoever gives it away at either equinox, along with a golden fish and a mileh cow, gives away the whole earth;" that is, he reaps a like reward, in his next migration. Special duties of the householder-Vratas or occasional acts of piety-are then described at considerable length, with legendary illustrations. The account of the universe is given in the usual strain. Saiva legends ensue: as the destruction of Tripurásura; the war of the gods with Táraka and the Daityas, and the consequent birth of Kárttikeya, with the various circumstances of Umá's birth and marriage, the burning of Kámadeva, and other events involved in that narrative; the destruction of the Asuras Maya and Andhaka; the origin of the Mátris, and the like; interspersed with the Vaishnava legends of the Avatáras. Some Máhátmyas are also introduced; one of which, the Narmadá Máhátmya, contains some interesting particulars. There are various chapters on law and morals, and one which furnishes directions for building houses and making images. We then have an account of the kings of future periods; and the Purána concludes with a chapter on gifts.

[&]quot; विषुवे हेममत्थेन धेन्वा चैव समन्तितम् । यो दवात्पृथिवी तेन दत्ता भवति चाखिला॥

The Matsya Puráńa, it will be seen, even from this brief sketch of its contents, is a miscellaneous compilation, but including, in its contents, the elements of a genuine Purána. At the same time, it is of too mixed a character to be considered as a genuine work of the Pauráńik class; and, upon examining it carefully, it may be suspected that it is indebted to various works, not only for its matter, but for its words. The genealogical and historical chapters are much the same as those of the Vishnu; and many chapters, as those on the Pitris and Śráddhas, are precisely the same as those of the Srishti Khanda of the Padma Purána. It has drawn largely also from the Mahábhárata. Amongst other instances, it is sufficient to quote the story of Sávitrí, the devoted wife of Satyavat, which is given in the Matsya in the same manner, but considerably abridged.

Although a Saiva work, it is not exclusively so; and it has not such sectarial absurdities as the Kúrma and Linga. It is a composition of considerable interest; but, if it has extracted its materials from the Padma,which it also quotes on one occasion, the specification of the Upapuránas,-it is subsequent to that work, and.

therefore, not very ancient.

17. Garuda Purána. "That which Vishnu recited in the Gáruda Kalpa, relating, chiefly, to the birth of Garuda from Vinatá, is here called the Gáruda Puráńa; and in it there are read nineteen thousand verses."1

The Garuda Purána which has been the subject of my examination corresponds in no respect with this description, and is, probably, a different work, though entitled the Garuda Purána. It is identical, however, with two copies in the Company's library. It consists of no more than about seven thousand stanzas; it is repeated by Brahmá to Indra; and it contains no account of the birth of Garuda. There is a brief notice of the creation; but the greater part is occupied with the description of Vratas or religious observances, of holydays, of sacred places dedicated to the sun, and with prayers from the Tántrika ritual, addressed to the sun, to Siva, and to Vishnu. It contains, also, treatises on astrology, palmistry, and precious stones, and one, still more extensive, on medicine. The latter portion, called the Preta Kalpa, is taken up with directions for the performance of obsequial rites. There is nothing, in all this, to justify the application of the name. Whether a genuine Garuda Purána exists is doubtful. The description given in the Matsya is less particular than even the brief notices of the other Puránas, and might have easily been written without any knowledge of the book itself; being, with exception of the number of stanzas, confined to circumstances that the title alone indicates.

18. Brahmánda Purána. "That which has declared, in twelve thousand two hundred verses, the magnificence of the egg of Brahmá, and in which an account of the future Kalpas is contained, is called the Brahmánda Purána, and was revealed by Brahmá."^{1*}

^{*} A very popular work which is considered to be a part of the Brahmáńda-puráńa, is the Adhyátma-rámáyańa. It has been lithographed, with the commentary of Nágeśa Bhatía, at Bombay. For some account of it, see Prof. Aufrecht's Catalog. Cod. Manuscript. &c., pp. 28 and 29.

The Brahmáńda Puráńa is usually considered to be in much the same predicament as the Skanda, no longer procurable in a collective body, but represented by a variety of Khańdas and Mahatmyas, professing to be derived from it. The facility with which any tract may be thus attached to the non-existent original, and the advantage that has been taken of its absence to compile a variety of unauthentic fragments, have given to the Brahmáńda, Skanda, and Padma, according to Colonel Wilford, the character of being "the Puránas of thieves or impostors."2 This is not applicable to the Padma, which, as above shown, occurs entire and the same in various parts of India. The imposition of which the other two are made the vehicles can deceive no one; as the purpose of the particular legend is always too obvious to leave any doubt of its origin.

Copies of what profess to be the entire Brahmáńda Puráńa are sometimes, though rarely, procurable. I met with one in two portions, the former containing one hundred and twenty-four chapters, the latter, seventy-eight; and the whole containing about the number of stanzas assigned to the Puráńa. The first and largest portion, however, proved to be the same as the Váyu Puráńa, with a passage occasionally slightly varied, and at the end of each chapter the common phrase 'Iti Brahmáńda Puráńe' substituted for 'Iti Váyu Puráńe'. I do not think there was any intended fraud in the substitution. The last section of the first part of the Váyu Puráńa is termed the Brahmáńda section, giving an account of the dissolution of the universe: and a careless or ignorant transcriber might have taken this for the title of the whole. The checks to the identity of the work have been honestly preserved, both in the index and the frequent specification of Váyu as the teacher or narrator of it.

The second portion of this Brahmánda is not any part of the Váyu: it is, probably, current in the Dakhin as a Samhitá or Khanda. Agastya is represented as going to the city Kánchí (Conjeveram), where Vishnu, as Hayagríva, appears to him, and, in answer to his inquiries, imparts to him the means of salvation, the worship of Parasakti. In illustration of the efficacy of this form of adoration, the main subject of the work is an account of the exploits of Lalitá Deví, a form of Durgá, and her destruction of the demon Bhándásura. Rules for her worship are also given, which are decidedly of a Śakta or Tántrika description; and this work cannot be admitted, therefore, to be part of a genuine Purána.

The Upapuráńas, in the few instances which are known, differ little, in extent or subject, from some of those to which the title of Puráńa is ascribed. The Matsya enumerates but four; but the Deví Bhágavata has a more complete list, and specifies eighteen. They are: 1. The Sanatkumára, 2. Nárasimha, * 3. Náradíya, 4. Śiva, 5. Durvásasa, 6. Kápila, 7. Mánava, 8. Auśanasa, 9. Váruna, 10. Káliká, 11. Sámba, 12. Nandi, 13. Saura, 14. Párásara, 15. Áditya, 16. Máheswara, 17. Bhágavata, 18. Vásishtha. The Matsya observes, of the second, that it is named in the Padma Purána, † and contains eighteen thousand verses. The Nandi it calls Nandá, and says, that Kárttikeya tells, in it, the story of Nandá.: A rather different list is given in the Revá Khańda; or: 1. Sanatkumára, 2. Nárasimha, 3. Nandá, 4. Śivadharma, 5. Daurvásasa, 6. Bhavishva, related by Nárada or Náradíya, 7. Kápila, 8. Mánava, 9. Auśanasa, 10. Brahmáńda, 11. Váruńa, 12. Káliká, 13. Máheśwara, 14. Śámba, 15. Saura, 16. Páráśara, 17. Bhágavata, 18. Kaurma. These authorities, however, are of questionable weight; having in view, no doubt, the pretensions of the Deví Bhágavata to be considered as the authentic Bhágavata.

Of these Upapuránas few are to be procured. Those in my possession are the Siva, considered as distinct from the Váyu, the Káliká, and, perhaps, one of the Náradívas, as noticed above. I have, also, three of the

† In the Revá-máhátmya, it is thus spoken of:

Skandhas of the Deví Bhágavata, which, most undoubtedly, is not the real Bhágavata, supposing that any Puráńa so named preceded the work of Bopadeva. There can be no doubt that in any authentic list the name of Bhágavata does not occur amongst the Upapuráńas: it has been put there to prove that there are two works so entitled, of which the Puráńa is the Deví Bhágavata, the Upapuráńa, the Śrí Bhágavata. The true reading should be Bhárgava,* the Puráńa of Bhŕigu: and the Deví Bhágavata is not even an Upapuráńa. It is very questionable if the entire work, which, as far as it extends, is eminently a Śákta composition, ever had existence.†

The Siva Upapurána contains about six thousand stanzas, distributed into two parts. It is related by Sanatkumára to Vyása and the Řishis at Naimisháranya; and its character may be judged of from the questions to which it is a reply. "Teach us", said the Řishis, "the rules of worshipping the Linga, and of the god of gods adored under that type: describe to us his various forms, the places sanctified by him, and the prayers with which he is to be addressed." In answer, Sanatkumára repeats the Šiva Purána, containing the birth of Vishóu and Brahmá; the creation and divisions of the universe; the origin of all things from the Linga; the rules of worshipping it and Šiva; the sanctity of times, places, and things, dedicated to him; the delusion of Brahmá and Vishúu by the Linga; the rewards of offering flowers and the like to a Linga; rules for various observances in honour of Mahádeva; the mode of practising the Yoga; the glory of Benares and other Saiva Tírthas; and the perfection of the objects of life by union with Maheśwara. These subjects are illustrated, in the first part, with very few legends; but the second is made up, almost wholly, of Saiva stories, as the defeat of Tripurásura; the sacrifice of Daksha; the births of Kárttikeva and Gańeśa, (the sons of Śiva), and Nandi and Bhringariti (his attendants), and others: together with descriptions of Benares and other places of pilgrimage, and rules for observing such festivals as the Sivarátri. This work is a Saiva manual, not a Purána.

The Káliká Puráńa contains about nine thousand stanzas, in ninety-eight chapters, and is the only work of the series dedicated to recommend the worship of the bride of Śiva, in one or other of her manifold forms, as Girijá, Deví, Bhadrakálí, Kálí, Mahámáyá. It belongs, therefore, to the Śákta modification of Hindu belief, or the worship of the female powers of the deities. The influence of this worship shows itself in the very first pages of the work, which relate the incestuous passion of Brahmá for his daughter Sandhyá, in a strain that has nothing analogous to it in the Váyu, Linga, or Śiva Puráńas.

The marriage of Siva and Párvatí is a subject early described, with the sacrifice of Daksha, and the death of Satí. And this work is authority for Siva's carrying the dead body about the world, and the origin of the Píthasthánas or places where the different members of it were scattered, and where Lingas were, consequently, erected. A legend follows of the births of Bhairava and Vetála, whose devotion to different forms of Deví furnishes occasion to describe, in great detail, the rites and formulæ of which her worship consists, including the chapters on sanguinary sacrifices, translated in the Asiatic Researches.* Another peculiarity in this work is afforded by very prolix descriptions of a number of rivers and mountains at Kámarúpa Tírtha, in Assam, and rendered holy ground by the celebrated temple of Durgá in that country, as Kámákshí or Kámákshyá. It is a singular, and yet uninvestigated, circumstance, that Assam, or, at least, the north-east of Bengal, seems to have been, in a great degree, the source from which the Tantrika and Sakta corruptions of the religion of the Vedas and Puránas proceeded.

The specification of the Upapuráńas, whilst it names several of which the existence is problematical, omits other works bearing the same designation, which are sometimes met with. Thus, in the collection of Colonel Mackenzie, we have a portion of the Bhárgava, and a Mudgala Puráńa, which is, probably, the same with the Gańeśa Upapuráńa, cited by Colonel Vans Kennedy. I have, also, a copy of the Gańeśa Puráńa, which seems to agree with that of which he speaks; the second portion being entitled the Krídá Khańda, in which the pastimes of Gańeśa, including a variety of legendary matters, are described. The main subject of the work is the greatness of Gańeśa; and prayers and formulæ appropriate to him are abundantly detailed. It appears to be a work originating with the Gańapatya sect, or worshippers of Gańeśa. There is, also, a minor Puráńa called Adi or 'first', not included in the list. This is a work, however, of no great extent or importance, and is confined to a detail of the sports of the juvenile Krishńa.

From the sketch thus offered of the subjects of the Puráńas, and which, although admitting of correction, is believed to be, in the main, a candid and accurate summary, it will be evident, that, in their present condition, they must be received with caution, as authorities for the mythological religion of the Hindus at any remote period. They preserve, no doubt, many ancient notions and traditions; but these have been so much mixed up with foreign matter, intended to favour the popularity of particular forms of worship, or articles of faith, that they cannot be unreservedly recognized as genuine representations of what we have reason to believe the Puráńas originally were.

The safest sources, for the ancient legends of the Hindus, after the Vedas, are, no doubt, the two great poems, the Rámáyana and Mahábharata. The first offers only a few; but they are of a primitive character. The Mahábharata is more fertile in fiction; but it is more miscellaneous; and much that it contains is of equivocal authenticity and uncertain date. Still, it affords many materials that are genuine; and it is, evidently, the great fountain from which most, if not all, of the Puránas have drawn; as it intimates, itself, when it declares, that there is no legend current in the world which has not its origin in the Mahábhárata.

A work of some extent, professing to be part of the Mahábhárata, may, more accurately, be ranked with the Pauráńik compilations of least authenticity and latest origin. The Hari Vamsa is chiefly occupied with the adventures of Krishńa; but, as introductory to his era, it records particulars of the creation of the world, and of the patriarchal and regal dynasties. This is done with much carelessness and inaccuracy of compilation; as I have had occasion, frequently, to notice, in the following pages. The work has been very industriously translated by M. Langlois.

A comparison of the subjects of the following pages with those of the other Puráńas will sufficiently show, that, of the whole series, the Vishńu most closely conforms to the definition of a Pancha-lakshańa Puráńa, or one which treats of five specified topics. It comprehends them all; and, although it has infused a portion of extraneous and sectarial matter, it has done so with sobriety and with judgment, and has not suffered the fervour of its religious zeal to transport it into very wide deviations from the prescribed path. The legendary tales which it has inserted are few, and are conveniently arranged, so that they do not distract the attention of the compiler from objects of more permanent interest and importance.

The first book of the six, into which the work is divided, is occupied chiefly with the details of creation, primary (Sarga) and secondary (Pratisarga); the first explaining how the universe proceeds from Prakriti or eternal crude matter; the second, in what manner the forms of things are developed from the elementary substances previously evolved, or how they reappear after their temporary destruction. Both these creations are periodical; but the termination of the first occurs only at the end of the life of Brahmá, when not only all the gods and all other forms are annihilated, but the elements are again merged into primary substance, besides which, one only spiritual being exists. The latter takes place at the end of every Kalpa or day of Brahmá, and affects only the forms of inferior creatures, and lower worlds; leaving the substance of the universe entire, and sages and gods unharmed. The explanation of these events involves a description of the periods of time upon which they depend, and which are, accordingly, detailed. Their character has been a source of very unnecessary perplexity to European writers; as they belong to a scheme of chronology wholly mythological, having no reference to any real or supposed history of the Hindus, but applicable, according to their system, to the infinite and eternal revolutions of the universe. In these notions, and in that of the coeternity of spirit and matter, the theogony and cosmogony of the Puránas, as they appear in the Vishnu Purána, belong to and illustrate systems of high antiquity, of which we have only fragmentary traces in the records of other nations.

The course of the elemental creation is, in the Vishnu, as in other Puránas, taken from the Sánkhya philosophy; but the agency that operates upon passive matter is confusedly exhibited, in consequence of a partial adoption of the illusory theory of the Vedánta philosophy, and the prevalence of the Pauránik doctrine of pantheism. However incompatible with the independent existence of Pradhána or crude matter, and however incongruous with the separate condition of pure spirit or Purusha, it is declared, repeatedly, that Vishnu, as one with the supreme being, is not only spirit, but crude matter, and not only the latter, but all visible substance, and Time. He is Purusha, 'spirit'; Pradhána, 'crude matter'; Vyakta, 'visible form'; and Kála, 'time'. This cannot but be regarded as a departure from the primitive dogmas of the Hindus, in which the distinctness of the Deity and his works was enunciated; in which, upon his willing the world to be, it was; and in which his interposition in creation, held to be inconsistent with the quiescence of perfection, was explained away by the personification of attributes in action, which afterwards came to be considered as real divinities, Brahmá, Vishńu, and Siva, charged, severally, for a given season, with the creation, preservation, and temporary annihilation of material forms. These divinities are, in the following pages, consistently with the tendency of a Vaishnava work, declared to be no other than Vishnu. In Saiva Puránas, they are, in like manner, identified with Siva; the Puranas thus displaying and explaining the seeming incompatibility, of which there are traces in other ancient mythologies, between three distinct hypostases of one superior deity, and the identification of one or other of those hypostases with their common and separate original.

After the world has been fitted for the reception of living creatures, it is peopled by the will-engendered sons of Brahmá, the Prajápatis or patriarchs, and their posterity. It would seem as if a primitive tradition of the descent of mankind from seven holy personages had at first prevailed, but that, in the course of time, it had been expanded into complicated, and not always consistent, amplification. How could these Rishis or patriarchs have posterity? It was necessary to provide them with wives. In order to account for their existence, the Manu Swayambhuva and his wife Satarupá were added to the scheme; or Brahmá becomes twofold, male and female; and daughters are then begotten, who are married to the Prajápatis. Upon this basis various legends of Brahmá's double nature, some, no doubt, as old as the Vedas, have been constructed. But, although they may have been derived, in some degree, from the authentic tradition of the origin of mankind from a single pair, yet the circumstances intended to give more interest and precision to the story are, evidently, of an allegorical or mystical description, and conduced, in apparently later times, to a coarseness of realization which was neither the letter nor spirit of the original legend. Swáyambhuva, the son of the self-born or uncreated, and his wife Satarupá, the hundred-formed or multiform, are, themselves, allegories; and their female descendants, who become the wives of the Rishis, are Faith, Devotion, Content, Intelligence, Tradition, and the like; whilst, amongst their posterity, we have the different phases of the moon and the sacrificial fires. In another creation, the chief source of creatures is the patriarch Daksha (ability), whose daughters—Virtues, or Passions, or Astronomical Phenomena—are the mothers of all existing things. These legends, perplexed as they appear to be, seem to admit of allowable solution, in the conjecture that the Prajápatis and Řishis were real personages, the authors of the Hindu system of social, moral, and religious obligations, and the first observers of the heavens, and teachers of astronomical science.

The regal personages of the Swayambhuva Manwantara are but few; but they are described, in the outset, as governing the earth in the dawn of society, and as introducing agriculture and civilization. How much of their story rests upon a traditional remembrance of their actions, it would be useless to conjecture; although there is no extravagance in supposing that the legends relate to a period prior to the full establishment, in India, of the Brahmanical institutions. The legends of Dhruva and Prahláda, which are intermingled with these particulars, are, in all probability, ancient; but they are amplified, in a strain conformable to the Vaishnava purport of this Purána, by doctrines and prayers asserting the identity of Vishnu with the Supreme. It is clear that the stories do not originate with this Purána. In that of Prahláda, particularly, as hereafter pointed out, circumstances essential to the completeness of the story are only alluded to, not recounted; showing, indisputably, the writer's having availed himself of some prior authority for his narration.

The second book opens with a continuation of the kings of the first Manwantara; amongst whom, Bharata is said to have given a name to India, called, after him, Bhárata-varsha. This leads to a detail of the geographical system of the Puránas, with mount Meru, the seven circular continents, and their surrounding oceans, to the limits of the world; all of which are mythological fictions, in which there is little reason to imagine that any topographical truths are concealed. With regard to Bhárata or India, the case is different. The mountains and rivers which are named are readily verifiable; and the cities and nations that are particularized may, also, in many instances, be proved to have had a real existence. The list is not a very long one, in the Vishnu Purána, and is, probably, abridged from some more ample detail, like that which the Mahábhárata affords, and which, in the hope of supplying information with respect to a subject yet imperfectly investigated, the ancient political condition of India, I have inserted and elucidated.

The description which this book also contains of the planetary and other spheres, is equally mythological, although occasionally presenting practical details and notions in which there is an approach to accuracy. The concluding legend of Bharata—in his former life, the king so named, but now a Brahman, who acquires true wisdom, and thereby attains liberation—is, palpably, an invention of the compiler, and is peculiar to this Purána.

The arrangement of the Vedas and other writings considered sacred by the Hindus,-being, in fact, the authorities of their religious rites and belief, -which is described in the beginning of the third book, is of much importance to the history of Hindu literature and of the Hindu religion. The sage Vyása is here represented, not as the author, but the arranger or compiler, of the Vedas, the Itihasas, and Puranas. His name denotes his character, meaning the 'arranger' or 'distributor'; * and the recurrence of many Vyásas, many individuals who new-modelled the Hindu scriptures, has nothing, in it, that is improbable, except the fabulous intervals by which their labours are separated. The rearranging, the refashioning, of old materials is nothing more than the progress of time would be likely to render necessary. The last recognized compilation is that of Krishna Dwaipayana, assisted by Brahmans who were already conversant with the subjects respectively assigned to them. They were the members of a college, or school, supposed, by the Hindus, to have flourished in a period more remote, no doubt, than the truth, but not at all unlikely to have been instituted at some time prior to the accounts of India which we owe to Greek writers, and in which we see enough of the system to justify our inferring that it was then entire. That there have been other Vyásas and other schools since that date, that Brahmans unknown to fame have remodelled some of the Hindu scriptures, and, especially, the Puránas, cannot reasonably be contested, after dispassionately weighing the strong internal evidence, which all of them afford, of the intermixture of unauthorized and comparatively modern ingredients. But the same internal testimony furnishes proof, equally decisive, of the anterior existence of ancient materials; and it is, therefore, as idle as it is irrational, to dispute the antiquity or authenticity of the greater portion of the contents of the Puránas, in the face of abundant positive and circumstantial evidence of the prevalence of the doctrines which they teach, the currency of the legends which they narrate. and the integrity of the institutions which they describe, at least three centuries before the Christian era. But the origin and development of their doctrines, traditions, and institutions were not the work of a day: and the testimony that establishes their existence three centuries before Christianity, carries it back to a much more remote antiquity, to an antiquity that is, probably, not surpassed by any of the prevailing fictions, institutions, or belief, of the ancient world.

The remainder of the third book describes the leading institutions of the Hindus, the duties of castes, the obligations of different stages of life, and the celebration of obsequial rites, in a short but primitive strain, and in harmony with the laws of Manu. It is a distinguishing feature of the Vishúu Puráńa, and it is characteristic of its being the work of an earlier period than most of the Puráńas, that it enjoins no sectarial or other acts of supererogation; no Vratas, occasional self-imposed observances; no holydays, no birthdays of Krishna, no nights dedicated to Lakshmi; no sacrifices or modes of worship other than those conformable to the ritual of the Vedas. It contains no Mahatmyas or golden legends, even of the temples in which Vishnu is adored.

The fourth book contains all that the Hindus have of their ancient history. It is a tolerably comprehensive list of dynasties and individuals: it is a barren record of events. It can scarcely be doubted, however, that much of it is a genuine chronicle of persons, if not of occurences. That it is discredited by palpable absurdities in regard to the longevity of the princes of the earlier dynasties, must be granted; and the particulars preserved of some of them are trivial and fabulous. Still, there is an inartificial simplicity and consistency in the succession of persons, and a possibility and probability in some of the transactions, which give to these traditions the semblance of authenticity, and render it likely, that they are not altogether without foundation. At any rate, in the absence of all other sources of information, the record, such as it is, deserves not to be altogether set aside. It is not essential to its credibility, or its usefulness, that any exact chronological adjustment of the different reigns should be attempted. Their distribution amongst the several Yugas, undertaken by Sir William Jones, or his Pandits, finds no countenance from the original texts, further than an incidental notice of the age in which a particular monarch ruled, or the general fact that the dynasties prior to Krishna precede the time of the Great War and the beginning of the Kali age; both which events we are not obliged, with the Hindus, to place five thousand years ago. To that age the solar dynasty of princes offers ninety-three descents, the lunar, but forty-five; though they both commence at the same time. Some names may have been added to the former list, some omitted in the latter; and it seems most likely, that, notwithstanding their synchronous beginning, the princes of the lunar race were subsequent to those of the solar dynasty. They avowedly branched off from the solar line; and the legend of Sudyumna, that explains the connexion, has every appearance of having been contrived for the purpose of referring it to a period more remote than the truth. Deducting, however, from the larger number of princes a considerable proportion, there is nothing to shock probability in supposing, that the Hindu dynasties and their ramifications were spread through an interval of about twelve centuries anterior to the war of the Mahábhárata, and, conjecturing that event to have happened about fourteen centuries before Christianity, thus carrying the commencement of the regal dynasties of India to about two thousand six hundred years before that date. This may, or may not, be too remote;2 but it is sufficient, in a subject

Book IV., Chapter I.

However incompatible with the ordinary computation of the period that is supposed to have elapsed between the flood and the birth of Christ, this falls sufficiently within the larger limits which are now assigned, upon the best authorities, to that period. As observed by Mr. Milman, in his note on the annotation of Gibbon (II., 301), which refers to this subject: "Most of the more learned modern English protestants, as Dr. Hales, Mr. Faber, Dr. Russell, as well as the continental writers, adopt the larger where precision is impossible, to be satisfied with the general impression, that, in the dynasties of kings detailed in the Puráńas, we have a record which, although it cannot fail to have suffered detriment from age, and may have been injured by careless or injudicious compilation, preserves an account, not wholly undeserving of confidence, of the establishment and succession of regular monarchies, amongst the Hindus, from as early an era, and for as continuous a duration, as any in the credible annals of mankind.

The circumstances that are told of the first princes have evident relation to the colonization of India, and the gradual extension of the authority of new races over an uninhabited or uncivilized region. It is commonly admitted, that the Brahmanical religion and civilization were brought into India from without. Certainly, there are tribes on the borders, and in the heart of the country, who are still not Hindus; and passages in the Rámáyańa, and Mahábhárata, and Manu, and the uniform traditions of the people themselves, point to a period when Bengal, Orissa, and the whole of the Dakhin were inhabited by degraded or outcaste, that is, by barbarous, tribes. The traditions of the Puráńas chronology." To these may be added the opinion of Dr. Mill, who, for reasons which he has fully detailed, identifies the commencement of the Kali age of the Hindus, B. C. 3102, with the era of the deluge. Christa Sangita, Introd., supplementary note.

confirm these views: but they lend no assistance to the determination of the question whence the Hindus came; whether from a central Asiatic nation, as Sir William Jones supposed, or from the Caucasian mountains, the plains of Babylonia, or the borders of the Caspian, as conjectured by Klaproth, Vans Kennedy, and Schlegel. The affinities of the Sanskrit language prove a common origin of the now widely scattered nations amongst whose dialects they are traceable, and render it unquestionable that they must all have spread abroad from some centrical spot in that part of the globe first inhabited by mankind, according to the inspired record. Whether any indication of such an event be discoverable in the Vedas, remains to be determined; but it would have been obviously incompatible with the Pauránik system to have referred the origin of Indian princes and principalities to other than native sources. We need not, therefore, expect, from them, any information as to the foreign derivation of the Hindus.

We have, then, wholly insufficient means for arriving at any information concerning the ante-Indian period of Hindu history, beyond the general conclusion derivable from the actual presence of barbarous and, apparently, aboriginal tribes—from the admitted progressive extension of Hinduism into parts of India where it did not prevail when the code of Manu was compiled—from the general use of dialects in India, more or less copious, which are different from Sanskrit—and from the affinities of that language with forms of speech current in the western world—that a people who spoke Sanskrit, and followed the religion of the Vedas, came into India, in some very distant age, from lands west of the Indus. Whether the date and circumstances of their immigration will ever be ascertained, is extremely doubtful: but it is not difficult to form a plausible outline of their early site and progressive colonization.

The earliest seat of the Hindus, within the confines of Hindusthán, was, undoubtedly, the eastern confines of the Punjab. The holy land of Manu and the Puránas lies between the Drishadwatí and Saraswatí rivers,-the Caggar and Sursooty of our barbarous maps. Various adventures of the first princes and most famous sages oceur in this vicinity; and the Asramas or religious domiciles of several of the latter are placed on the banks of the Saraswatí. According to some authorities. it was the abode of Vyása, the compiler* of the Vedas and Puránas; and, agreeably to another, when, on one occasion, the Vedas had fallen into disuse and been forgotten, the Brahmans were again instructed in them by Sáraswata, the son of Saraswatí. One of the most distinguished of the tribes of the Brahmans is known as the Sáraswata; 2 and the same word is employed, by Mr. Colebrooke, to denote that modification of Sanskrit which is termed generally Prakrit, and which, in this case, he supposes to have been the language of the Sáraswata nation, "which occupied the banks of the river Saraswatí."3 The river itself receives its appellation from Saraswatí, the goddess of learning, under whose auspices the sacred literature of the Hindus assumed shape and authority. These indications render it certain, that, whatever seeds were imported from without, it was in the country adjacent to the Saraswatí river that they were first planted, and cultivated, and reared, in Hindusthán.

The tract of land thus assigned for the first establishment of Hinduism in India, is of very circumscribed extent, and could not have been the site of any numerous tribe or nation. The traditions that evidence the early settlement of the Hindus in this quarter, ascribe to the settlers more of a philosophical and religious, than of a secular, character, and combine, with the very narrow bounds of the holy land, to render it possible, that the earliest emigrants were the members, not of a political, so much as of a religious, community; that they were a colony of priests, not in the restricted sense in which we use the term, but in that in which it still applies in India, to an Agrahára, a village or hamlet of Brahmans, who, although married, and having families, and engaging in tillage, in domestic duties, and in the conduct of secular interests affecting the community, are, still, supposed to devote their principal attention to sacred study and religious offices. A society of this description, with its artificers and servants, and, perhaps, with a body of martial followers, might have found a home in the Brahmávarta of Manu, the land which, thence, was entitled 'the holy', or, more literally, 'the Brahman, region', and may have communicated to the rude, uncivilized, unlettered, aborigines the rudiments of social organization, literature, and religion; partly, in all probability, brought along with them, and partly devised and fashioned, by degrees, for the growing necessities of new conditions of society. Those with whom this civilization commenced would have had ample inducements to prosecute their successful work; and, in the course of time, the improvement which germinated on the banks of the Saraswatí was extended beyond the borders of the Jumna and the Ganges.

We have no satisfactory intimation of the stages by which the political organization of the people of Upper India traversed the space between the Saraswatí and the more easterly region, where it seems to have taken a concentrated form, and whence it diverged, in various directions, throughout Hindusthán. The Manu of the present period, Vaivaswata, the son of the Sun, is regarded as the founder of Ayodhyá; and that city continued to be the capital of the most celebrated branch of his descendants, the posterity of Ikshwaku. The Vishnu Purána evidently intends to describe the radiation of conquest or colonization from this spot, in the accounts it gives of the dispersion of Vaivaswata's posterity; and, although it is difficult to understand what could have led early settlers in India to such a site, it is not inconveniently situated as a commanding position whence emigrations might proceed to the east, the west, and the south. This seems to have happened. A branch from the house of Ikshwaku spread into Tirhoot, constituting the Maithila kings; and the posterity of another of Vaivaswata's sons reigned at Vaisálí, in Southern Tirhoot, or Sarun.

The most adventurous emigrations, however, took place through the lunar dynasty, which, as observed above, originates from the solar; making, in fact, but one race and source for the whole. Leaving out of consideration the legend of Sudyumna's double transformation, the first prince of Pratishthána, a city south from Ayodhyá, was one of Vaivaswata's children, equally with Ikshwaku. The sons of Pururavas, the second of this branch, extended, by themselves, or their posterity, in every direction: to the east, to Kásí, Magadhá, Benares, and Behar; southwards, to the Vindhya hills, and, across them, to Vidarbha or Berar; westwards, along the Narmadá, to Kuśasthalí or Dwáraká in Gujerat; and, in a north-westerly direction, to Mathurá and Hastinápura. These movements are very distinctly discoverable amidst the circumstances narrated in the fourth book of the Vishnu Purána, and are precisely such as might be expected from a radiation of colonies from Ayodhyá. Intimations also occur of settlements in Banga, Kalinga, and the Dakhin: but they are brief and indistinct, and have the appearance of additions subsequent to the comprehension of those countries within the pale of Hinduism.

Besides these traces of migration and settlement, several curious circumstances, not likely to be unauthorized inventions, are hinted in these historical traditions. The distinction of castes was not fully developed prior to the colonization. Of the sons of Vaivaswata, some, as kings, were Kshatriyas; but one founded a tribe of Brahmans, another became a Vaisya, and a fourth, a Śúdra. It is also said, of other princes, that they established the four castes amongst their subjects. There are, also, various notices of Brahmanical Gotras or families, proceeding from Kshatriya races;2 and there are several indications of severe struggles between the two ruling castes, not for temporal, but for spiritual, dominion, the right to teach the Vedas. This seems to be the especial purport of the inveterate hostility that prevailed between the Brahman Vasishtha and the Kshatriya Viśwamitra, who, as the Ramayana relates, compelled the gods to make him a Brahman also, and whose posterity became very celebrated as the Kauśika Brahmans. Other legends, again, such as Daksha's sacrifice, denote sectarial strife; and the legend of Parasuráma reveals a conflict even for temporal authority, between the two ruling castes. More or less weight will be attached to these conjectures, according to the temperament of different inquirers. But, even whilst fully aware of the facility with which plausible deductions may cheat the fancy, and little disposed to relax all curb upon the imagination, I find it difficult to regard these legends as wholly unsubstantial fictions, or devoid of all resemblance to the realities of the past.

After the date of the great war, the Vishńu Puráńa, in common with those Puráńas which contain similar lists, specifies kings and dynasties with greater precision, and offers political and chronological particulars to which, on the score of probability, there is nothing to object. In truth, their general accuracy has been incontrovertibly established. Inscriptions on columns of stone, on rocks, on coins, deciphered only of late years, through the extraordinary ingenuity and perseverance of Mr. James Prinsep, have verified the names of races and titles of princes-the Gupta and Andhra Rajas, mentioned in the Puránas—and have placed beyond dispute the identity of Chandragupta and Sandrocoptus; thus giving us a fixed point from which to compute the date of other persons and events. Thus, the Vishnu Purána specifies the interval between Chandragupta and the Great War to be eleven hundred years; and the occurence of the latter little more than fourteen centuries B. C., as shown in my observations on the passage,1 remarkably concurs with inferences of the like date from different premises. The historical notices that then follow are considerably confused: but they probably afford an accurate picture of the political distractions of India at the time when they were written: and much of the perplexity arises from the corrupt state of the manuscripts, the obscure brevity of the record, and our total want of the means of collateral illustration.

The fifth book of the Vishnu Purána is exclusively occupied with the life of Krishna. This is one of the distinguishing characteristics of the Purána, and is one argument against its antiquity. It is possible, though not yet proved, that Krishna, as an Avatára of Vishnu, is mentioned in an indisputably genuine text of the Vedas. He is conspicuously prominent in the Mahábhárata, but very contradictorily described there. The part that he usually performs is that of a mere mortal; although the passages are numerous that attach divinity to his person. There are, however, no descriptions, in the Mahábhárata, of his juvenile frolics, of his sports in Vrindávana, his pastimes with the cow-boys, or even his destruction of the Asuras sent to kill him. These stories have, all, a modern complexion; they do not harmonize with the tone of the ancient legends, which is, generally, grave, and, sometimes, majestic. They are the creations of a puerile taste and grovelling imagination. These chapters of the Vishnu Purána offer some difficulties as to their originality. They are the same as those on the same subject in the Brahma Puráńa: they are not very dissimilar to those of the Bhágavata. The latter has some incidents which the Vishnu has not, and may, therefore, be thought to have improved upon the prior narrative of the latter. On the other hand, abridgment is equally a proof of posteriority as amplification. The simpler style of the Vishnu Purána is, however, in favour of its priority; and the miscellaneous composition of the Brahma Purána renders it likely to have borrowed these chapters from the Vishnu. The life of Krishna in the Hari Vamsa and the Brahma Vaivarta are, indisputably, of later date.

The last book contains an account of the dissolution of the world, in both its major and minor cataclysms; and, in the particulars of the end of all things by fire and water, as well as in the principle of their perpetual renovation, presents a faithful exhibition of opinions that were general in the ancient world.¹ The meta-

Dr. Thomas Burnet has collected the opinions of the ancient world on this subject, tracing them, as he says, "to the earliest physical annihilation of the universe, by the release of the spirit from bodily existence, offers, as already remarked, other analogies to doctrines and practices taught by Pythagoras and Plato, and by the Platonic Christians of later days.

The Vishnu Purana has kept very clear of particulars from which an approximation to its date may be conjectured. No place is described of which the sacredness has any known limit, nor any work cited of probable recent composition. The Vedas, the Puránas, other works forming the body of Sanskrit literature, are named: and so is the Mahábhárata, to which, therefore, it is subsequent. Both Bauddhas and Jainas are adverted to. It was, therefore, written before the former had disappeared. But they existed, in some parts of India, as late as the twelfth century, at least; and it is probable that the Purána was compiled before that period. The Gupta kings reigned in the seventh century.* The historical record of the Purána which mentions them was, therefore, later: and there seems little doubt that the same alludes to the first incursions of the Mohammedans, which took place in the eighth century; which brings it still lower. In describing the latter dynasties, some, if not all, of which were, no doubt, contemporary, they are described as reigning, people, and the first appearances of wisdom after the Flood." Sacred Theory of the Earth, Book III., Chapter III. The Hindu account explains what is imperfect or contradictory in ancient tradition, as handed down from other and less carefully perpetuated sources.

^{*} More recent researches have rendered this conclusion doubtful.

altogether, one thousand seven hundred and ninety-six years. Why this duration should have been chosen does not appear; unless, in conjunction with the number of years which are said to have elapsed between the Great War and the last of the Andhra dynasty, which preceded these different races, and which amounted to two thousand three hundred and fifty, the compiler was influenced by the actual date at which he wrote. The aggregate of the two periods would be the Kali year 4146, equivalent to A. D. 1045. There are some variety and indistinctness in the enumeration of the periods which compose this total: but the date which results from it is not unlikely to be an approximation to that of the Vishńu Puráńa.

It is the boast of inductive philosophy, that it draws its conclusions from the careful observation and accumulation of facts; and it is, equally, the business of all philosophical research to determine its facts before it ventures upon speculation. This procedure has not been observed in the investigation of the mythology and traditions of the Hindus. Impatience to generalize has availed itself greedily of whatever promised to afford materials for generalization; and the most erroneous views have been confidently advocated, because the guides to which their authors trusted were ignorant or insufficient. The information gleaned by Sir William Jones was gathered in an early season of Sanskrit study, before the field was cultivated. The same may be said of the writings of Paolino da S. Bartolomeo,1 with the further disadvantage of his having been imperfectly acquainted with the Sanskrit language and literature, and his veiling his deficiencies under loftiness of pretension and a prodigal display of misapplied erudition. The documents to which Wilford1 trusted proved to be, in great part, fabrications, and, where genuine, were mixed up with so much loose and unauthenticated matter, and so overwhelmed with extravagance of speculation, that his citations need to be carefully and skilfully sifted, before they can be serviceably employed. The descriptions of Ward 2 are too deeply tinctured by his prejudices to be implicitly confided in; and they are also derived, in a great measure, from the oral or written communications of Bengali pandits, who are not, in general, very deeply read in the authorities of their mythology. The accounts of Polier3 were, in like manner, collected from questionable sources; and his Mythologie des Indous presents an heterogeneous mixture of popular and Pauránik tales, of ancient traditions, and legends apparently invented for the occasion, which renders the publication worse than useless, except in the hands of those who can distinguish the pure metal from the alloy. Such are the authorities to which Maurice, Faber, and Creuzer have exclusively trusted, in their description of the Hindu mythology; and it is no marvel that there should have been an utter confounding of good and bad in their selection of materials, and an inextricable mixture of truth and error in their conclusions. Their labours, accordingly, are far from entitled to that confidence which their learning and industry would, else, have secured; and a sound and comprehensive survey of the Hindu system is still wanting to the comparative analysis of the religious opinions of the ancient world, and to a satisfactory elucidation of an important chapter in the history of the human race. It is with the hope of supplying some of the necessary means for the accomplishment of these objects, that the following pages have been translated.

The translation of the Vishnu Purána has been made from a collation of various manuscripts in my possession. I had three, when I commenced the work; two in the Devanagari, and one in the Bengali, character. A fourth, from the west of India, was given to me by Major Jervis, when some progress had been made; and, in conducting the latter half of the translation through the press, I have compared it with three other copies in the library of the East India Company. All these copies closely agree; presenting no other differences than occasional varieties of reading, owing, chiefly, to the inattention or inaccuracy of the transcriber. Four of the copies were accompanied by a commentary, essentially the same, although occasionally varying, and ascribed, in part, at least, to two different scholiasts. The annotations on the first two books and the fifth are, in two MSS., said to be the work of Śrídhara Yati, the disciple of Paránanda Nŕihari, and who is, therefore, the same as Śridhara Swámin, the commentator on the Bhágavata. In the other three books, these two MSS. concur with other two in naming the commentator Ratnagarbha Bhattáchárya, who, in those two, is the author of the notes on the entire work. The introductory verses* of his comment specify him to be the disciple of Vidyáváchaspati, the son of Hirańyagarbha, and grandson of Mádhava, who composed his commentary by desire of Súryákara, son of Ratinátha Miśra, son of Chandrákara, hereditary ministers of some sovereign who is not particularized. In the illustrations which are attributed to these different writers, there is so much conformity, that one or other is largely indebted to his predecessor. They both refer to earlier commentaries. Śrídhara cites the works of Chitsukha Yogin and others, both more extensive and more concise; between which, his own, which he terms Átma- or Swa-prakáśa, 'self-illuminator',

* The verses referred to are as follows:

हिरखयर्भतनयो माधवस्थात्मजात्मजः। श्रीरत्नगर्भसनुते वैष्णवाकृतचन्द्रिकाम्॥ पुराणसंहितासारं पौलस्त्वाद्वेष्णवं वरात्। पराग्ररमुनियके पुराणं पञ्चलकणम्॥ षद्वहसं षडंग्रं तट्टीकया क्रतया स्वयम्। श्रीसूर्याकरमिश्रातियत्नतः संकुलीकृतम्॥

At the end of Ratnagarbha's commentary we read:

यद्ख ग्रन्थ सुरुपद्पद्राधादिविदुषां न नेवामप्पर्धः सुरित सित सन्देहितिसिरे। स्रतो विद्यावाचस्यतिवचनदीपावित्तमता स्या बक्तानधान्हदि नुस्त सनः सहद्याः॥ चन्द्राकर्स्य तनयो रितनाथिसिश्रः चोणीन्द्रमन्त्रज्ञद्रभूद्य तत्नुतेन। सूर्याकरेस नृपमन्त्रविदेश यता-त्संग्राधितो विहितवानहमस्य टीकाम्॥ holds an intermediate character.* Ratnagarbha entitles his, Vaishńavákúta-chandriká, 'the moonlight of devotion to Vishńu.' The dates of these commentators are not ascertainable, as far as I am aware, from any of the particulars which they have specified.

In the notes which I have added to the translation, I have been desirous, chiefly, of comparing the statements of the text with those of other Puránas, and pointing out the circumstances in which they differ or agree; so as to render the present publication a sort of concordance to the whole; as it is not very probable that many of them will be published or translated. The Index that follows † has been made sufficiently copious to answer the purposes of a mythological and historical dictionary, as far as the Puránas, or the greater number of them, furnish materials.

In rendering the text into English, I have adhered to it as literally as was compatible with some regard to the usages of English composition. In general, the original presents few difficulties. The style of the Puránas is, very commonly, humble and easy; and the narrative is plainly and unpretendingly told. In the addresses to the deities, in the expatiations upon the divine nature, in the descriptions of the universe, and in argumentative and metaphysical discussion, there occur passages in which the difficulty arising from the subject itself is enhanced by the brief and obscure manner in which it is treated. On such occasions, I derived much aid from the commentary. But it is possible that I may have, sometimes, misapprehended and misrepresented the original; and it is, also, possible that I may have sometimes failed to express its purport with sufficient precision to have made it intelligible. I trust, however, that this will not often be the case, and that the translation of the Vishnu Purána will be of service and of interest to the few who, in these times of utilitarian selfishness, conflicting opinion, party virulence, and political agitation, can find a resting-place for their thoughts in the tranquil contemplation of those yet living pictures of the ancient world which are exhibited by the literature and mythology of the Hindus.

श्रीमचित्सुखयोगिमुखरचितवाखां निरीच्य सुटं तनार्गेण सुवीधसंग्रहवतीमात्मप्रकाशाभिधाम् । श्रीमद्विष्णुपुराणसारविवृतिं कता चितः श्रीधर-खामी सद्गुष्पादपद्ममध्यः साधुः खधीशुद्धये ॥ श्रीमद्विष्णुपुराणस्य वाख्यां स्वचातिविस्त्राम् । प्राचामाकोक्य तद्वाख्या मध्यमेयं विधीयते ॥

CHAPTER I.

Invocation. Maitreya inquires of his teacher, Parásara, the origin and nature of the universe. Parásara performs a rite to destroy the demons: reproved by Vasishíha, he desists: Pulastya appears, and bestows upon him divine knowledge: he repeats the Vishúu Purána. Vishúu the origin, existence, and end of all things.

CHAPTER XXV.

Balaráma finds wine in the hollow of a tree; becomes inebriated; commands the Yamuná to come to him, and, on her refusal, drags her out of her course: Lakshmí gives him ornaments and a dress: he returns to Dwáraká and marries Revatí.

CHAPTER XXVI.

Křishňa carries off Rukmińí: the princes who come to rescue her repulsed by Balaráma. Rukmin overthrown, but, spared by Křishňa, founds Bhojakata. Pradyumna born of Rukmińí.

CHAPTER XXVII.

Pradyumna stolen by Śambara; thrown into the sea, and swallowed by a fish; found by Máyádeví: he kills Śambara, marries Máyádeví, and returns, with her, to Dwáraká. Joy of Rukminí and Krishúa.

CHAPTER XXVIII.

Wives of Krishna. Pradyumna has Aniruddha: nuptials of the latter. Balarama, beat at dice, becomes incensed, and slays Rukmin and others.

CHAPTER XXIX.

Indra comes to Dwáraká, and reports to Kŕishna the tyranny of Naraka. Kŕishna goes to his city, and puts him to death. Earth gives the earrings of Aditi to Kŕishna, and praises him.

He liberates the princesses made captive by Naraka, sends to Dwáraká, and goes to Swarga, with Satyabhámá.

CHAPTER XXX.

Kŕishna restores her earrings to Aditi, and is praised by her: he visits the gardens of Indra, and, at the desire of Satyabhámá, carries off the Párijáta tree. Sachí excites Indra to its rescue. Conflict between the gods and Krishna, who defeats them. Satyabhámá derides them. They praise Křishňa.

CHAPTER XXXI.

Kŕishňa, with Indra's consent, takes the Párijáta tree to Dwáraká; marries the princesses rescued from Naraka.

CHAPTER XXXII.

Children of Krishna. Úshá, the daughter of Bána, sees Aniruddha in a dream, and becomes enamoured of him.

CHAPTER XXXIII.

Bána solicits Siva for war: finds Aniruddha in the palace, and makes him prisoner. Krishna, Balarama, and Pradyumna come to his rescue. Siva and Skanda aid Bána: the former is disabled; the latter, put to flight. Bána encounters Krishna, who cuts off all his arms, and is about to put him to death. Siva intercedes, and Krishna spares his life. Vishnu and Siva are the same.

CHAPTER XXXIV.

Pauńdraka, a Vásudeva, assumes the insignia and style of Krishńa, supported by the king of Kásí. Křishňa marches against and destroys them. The son of the king sends a magical being against Krishna: destroyed by his discus, which also sets Benares on fire, and consumes it and its inhabitants.

CHAPTER XXXV.

Samba carries off the daughter of Duryodhana, but is taken prisoner. Balaráma comes to Hastinápura, and demands his liberation: it is refused: in his wrath, he drags the city towards him, to throw it into the river. The Kuru chiefs give up Samba and his wife.

CHAPTER XXXVI.

The Asura Dwivida, in the form of an ape, destroyed by Balaráma.

CHAPTER XXXVII.

Destruction of the Yádavas. Sámba and others deceive and ridicule the Rishis. The former bears an iron pestle: it is broken, and thrown into the sea. The Yádavas go to Prabhása, by desire of Kŕishúa: they quarrel and fight, and all perish. The great serpent Sesha issues from the mouth of Ráma. Kŕishúa is shot by a hunter, and again becomes one with universal spirit.

CHAPTER XXXVIII.

Arjuna comes to Dwáraká, and burns the dead, and takes away the surviving inhabitants. Commencement of the Kali age. Shepherds and thieves attack Arjuna, and carry off the women and wealth. Arjuna regrets the loss of his prowess to Vyása; who consoles him, and tells him the story of Ashtávakra's cursing the Apsarasas. Arjuna and his brothers place Parikshit on the throne, and go to the forests. End of the fifth book.

BOOK VI.

CHAPTER I.

Of the dissolution of the world: the four ages: the decline of all things, and deterioration of mankind, in the Kali age.

CHAPTER II.

Redeeming properties of the Kali age. Devotion to Vishnu sufficient to salvation, in that age, for all castes and persons.

CHAPTER III.

Three different kinds of dissolution. Duration of a Parardha.

The clepsydra or vessel for measuring time. The dissolution that occurs at the end of a day of Brahmá.

CHAPTER IV.

Continuation of the account of the first kind of dissolution. Of the second kind, or elemental dissolution; of all being resolved into primary spirit.

CHAPTER V.

The third kind of dissolution, or final liberation from existence. Evils of worldly life. Sufferings in infancy, manhood, old age. Pains of hell. Imperfect felicity of heaven. Exemption from birth desirable by the wise. The nature of spirit or god. Meaning of the terms Bhagavat and Vásudeva.

CHAPTER VI.

Means of attaining liberation. Anecdotes of Khándikya and Keśidhwaja. The former instructs the latter how to atone for permitting the death of a cow. Keśidhwaja offers him a requital, and he desires to be instructed in spiritual knowledge.

CHAPTER VIL

Keśidhwaja describes the nature of ignorance, and the benefits of the Yoga or contemplative devotion. Of the novice and the adept in the performance of the Yoga. How it is performed. The first stage, proficiency in acts of restraint and moral duty: the second, particular mode of sitting: the third, Práńáyáma, modes of breathing: the fourth, Pratyáhára, restraint of thought: the fifth, apprehension of spirit: the sixth, retention of the idea. Meditation on the individual and universal forms of Vishńu. Acquirement of knowledge. Final liberation.

VISHŃU PURÁŃA.

BOOK I.

CHAPTER I.

Invocation. Maitreya inquires of his teacher, Paráśara, the origin and nature of the universe. Paráśara performs a rite to destroy the demons: reproved by Vasishíha, he desists: Pulastya appears, and bestows upon him divine knowledge: he repeats the Vishńu Puráńa. Vishńu the origin, existence, and end of all things.

OM! GLORY TO VÁSUDEVA. — Victory be to thee, Puńdaríkáksha; adoration be to thee, Viśwabhávana;

ा स्रोम्। नमो वासुदेवार। An address of this kind, to one or other Hindu divinity, usually introduces Sanskrit compositions, especially those considered sacred. The first term of this Mantra or brief prayer, Om or Omkára, is well known as a combination of letters invested by Hindu mysticism with peculiar sanctity. In the Vedas, it is said to comprehend all the gods; and, in the Puránas, it is directed to be prefixed to all such formulæ as that of the text. Thus, in the Uttara Khanda* of the Padma Purána: 'The syllable Om, the mysterious name, or Brahma, is the leader of all prayers: let it, therefore, O lovely-faced, (Siva addresses Durgá,) be employed in the beginning of all prayers':

त्रींकारः प्रण्वो ब्रह्म सर्वमन्त्रेषु नायकः। आदौ सर्वच युझीत मन्त्राणां च शुभानने॥

^{*} Chapter XXXII.

glory be to thee, Hrishíkeśa, Mahápurusha and Púrvaja. 1

According to the same authority, one of the mystical imports of the term is the collective enunciation of Vishńu, expressed by A; of Śrí, his bride, intimated by U; and of their joint worshipper, designated by M. A whole chapter of the Váyu Puráńa is devoted to this term. A text of the Vedas is there cited: Altermeaning either the supreme being, or the Vedas collectively, of which this monosyllable is the type. It is also said to typify the three spheres of the world, the three holy fires, the three steps of Vishńu, &c.:

श्रोमित्येतत्त्रयो वेदास्त्रयो बोकास्त्रयो ऽपयः।* विष्णुकमास्त्रयस्त्रेते ऋक्सामानि यजूषि च॥

Frequent meditation upon it and repetition of it ensure release from worldly existence:

इत्येतद्वरं ब्रह्म परमोकारसंज्ञितम् । यसु वेदयते सम्यक्तया ध्यायति वा पुनः ॥ संसारचक्रमृत्मृत्य मुक्तवद्यवन्धनः । अचलं निर्मृत्यं स्थानं शिवं प्राप्तीत्यसंग्रयः ॥

See, also, Manu, II., 76. Vásudeva, a name of Vishúu or Kŕishúa, is, according to its grammatical etymology, a patronymic derivative implying son of Vasudeva. The Vaishúava Puráúas, however, devise other explanations. See the next chapter, and, again, b. VI., c. 5.

1. Puńdaríkáksha (पुण्डरोबाच), having eyes like a lotos, or heart-pervading: or Puńdaríka is explained supreme glory, and Aksha, imperishable. The first is the most usual etymon. 2. Viśwabhávana (विश्वभावन), the creator of the universe, or the cause of the existence of all things. 3. Hřishíkeśa (इपीनेश्),

^{*} This verse is also found in the Markańdeya-purańa, XLII., 8; p. 241 of the edition in the Bibliotheca Indica.

May that Vishńu, who is the existent, imperishable Brahma; who is Íswara; who is spirit; who, with the three qualities, is the cause of creation, preservation, and destruction; who is the parent of nature, intellect, lord of the senses. * 4. Mahápurusha (য়য়য়ড়ড়), great or supreme spirit; Purusha meaning that which abides or is quiescent in body (puri śete). 5. Púrvaja (য়য়য়ড়), produced or appearing before creation; the Orphic πρωτόγονος. In the fifth book, c. 18, Vishńu is described by five appellations which are considered analogous to these; or: 1. Bhútátman (য়য়য়ড়), one with created things, or Puńdaríkáksha; 2. Pradhánátman (য়য়য়ড়), one with crude nature, or Viśwabhávana; 3. Indriyátman (য়য়য়ড়), one with the senses, or Hŕishíkeśa; 4. Paramátman (য়য়য়ড়), soul, living soul, animating nature and existing before it, or Púrvaja.

- ¹ Brahma (ब्रह्मन्), in the neuter form, is abstract supreme spirit; and Íśwara (६्यर्) is the deity in his active nature, he who is able to do or leave undone, or to do anything in any other manner that that in which it is done: कर्तुमकर्तुमन्यथा कर्तुं समर्थ: ।
- ² Pums (ytt), which is the same with Purusha, incorporated spirit. By this, and the two preceding terms, also, the commentator understands the text to signify, that Vishnu is any form of spiritual being that is acknowledged by different philosophical systems; or that he is the Brahma of the Vedanta, the Iśwara of the Pátanjala, and the Purusha of the Sánkhya, school.
- ³ The three qualities, to which we shall have further occasion to advert, are: Sattwa (स्त्व), goodness or purity, knowledge, and the other ingredients of the universe; 1 be to us the bestower of understanding, wealth, and final emancipation.

^{*} In the Mahábhárata, Udyoga-parvan, 2564 and 2567, Puńdarikáksha and Hŕishíkeśa are explained to a very different purport. The stanzas are quoted and translated in Muir's Original Sanskrit Texts, Part IV., pp. 182 and 183.

Having adored Vishnu,2 the lord of all, and paid quiescence; Rajas (रजस), foulness, passion, activity; and Tamas (तसस), darkness, ignorance, inertia.

- ¹ Pradhánabuddhyádijagatprapanchasúh (प्रधाननुद्धाद्विजाता-प्रञ्चन्द्र). This predicate of the deity distinguishes most of the Puránas from several of the philosophical systems, which maintain, as did the earliest Grecian systems of cosmogony, the eternal and independent existence of the first principle of things, as nature, matter, or chaos. Accordingly, the commentator notices the objection. Pradhána being without beginning, it is said, How can Vishnu be its parent? To which he replies, that this is not so; for, in a period of worldly destruction (Pralaya), when the creator desists from creating, nothing is generated by virtue of any other energy or parent. Or, if this be not satisfactory, then the text may be understood to imply that intellect (Buddhi), &c., are formed through the materiality of crude nature or Pradhána.
- ² Vishnu is commonly derived, in the Puranas, from the root Viś (विश्व), to enter; entering into or pervading the universe: agreeably to the text of the Vedas: तत्युदा तद्वानुप्रविश्वति । 'Having created that (world), he then afterwards enters into it;' being, as our comment observes, undistinguished by place, time, or property: देशकास्वरूपतो व्यक्तिमावात् । According to the Matsya P., the name alludes to his entering into the mundane egg: according to the Padma P., to his entering into, or combining with, Prakriti, as Purusha or spirit:

स एव भगवान्विष्णुः प्रक्रत्यामाविवेश ह।

In the Moksha Dharma of the Mahábhárata, s. 165, the word is derived from the root ví (क्), signifying motion, pervasion, reverence to Brahmá and the rest; having also saluted the spiritual preceptor; I will narrate a Purána equal in sanctity to the Vedas.

^{*} See the editor's second note in p. 26, and note in p. 35, infra.

production, radiance; or, irregularly, from kram (ज्ञास), to go, with the particle vi (चि), implying variously, prefixed. *

² The Guru or spiritual preceptor is said to be Kapila or Sáraswata. The latter is included in the series of teachers of the Puráńa. Paráśara must be considered also as a disciple of Kapila, as a teacher of the Sánkhya philosophy.

* There seems to be a misunderstanding, here, on the part of the translator; for, in the passage of the Mahábhárata referred to by him,—which can be no other than the Śánti-parvan, Moksha-dharma, 13170 and 13171—Vishúu is taken to be derived, with the affix \overline{q} , from \overline{q} to shine" and also "to move". That passage is subjoined:

गतिस सर्वभूतानां प्रजनसापि भारत। व्याप्ता मे रोदसी पार्थ कान्तिसास्यधिका मम॥ ऋधिभूतानि चानेषु तदिच्छंसापि भारत। क्रमणाद्यापहं पार्थ निष्णुरित्यभिसंज्ञितः॥

Arjuna Miśra, commenting on these verses, derives the word from विच्छा in the acceptation of "to go". He seems to admit this verb likewise in the Vaidik sense of "to eat." But the latter view is not borne out by the text. His words are: विष्णुपद्शुत्पत्तिमाह। गतिस्ति। विच्छिंगेल्थाः। तन विच्छाते। अनेनिति विष्णुः। अतीति वा निक्तम्।

In the Nighantu, II., 8, वर्गष्ट occurs as a synonym of जाति. Gangadhara, in his metrical gloss on the thousand names of Vishnu, expresses himself as follows, touching the six hundred and fifty-seventh of them:

वेवेष्टि कान्तित इमे किल रोदसी वा। विष्णुः स विच्हयति सो ४ छ हि दीष्यते नुः॥ यापे मे रोदसी पार्थ कान्तिरम्यधिका स्थिता। क्रमणाद्वाप्यहं पार्थ विष्णुरित्यभिसंचितः॥ इत्रुक्ते मोच्धमें हि विच्ह दीप्ती च धातुतः। चौरादिकस्वेदमुक्तम्॥

Maitreya, having saluted him reverentially, thus addressed Paráśara,—the excellent sage, the grandson of Vasishtha, —who was versed in traditional history and the Puráńas; who was acquainted with the Vedas and the branches of science dependent upon them, and skilled in law and philosophy; † and who had performed the morning rites of devotion.

Maitreya said: Master! I have been instructed, by you, in the whole of the Vedas, and in the institutes of law and of sacred science. Through your favour, other men, even though they be my foes, cannot accuse me of having been remiss in the acquirement of knowledge. I am now desirous, O thou who art profound in piety, to hear from thee how this world was, and how in future it will be? what is its substance, O Brahman; and whence proceeded animate and inanimate things? into what has it been resolved; and into what will its dissolution again occur? how were the elements manifested? whence proceeded the gods and other beings? what are the situation and extent of the oceans and the mountains, the earth, the sun, and the planets? what are the families of the gods and others, the Manus, the periods called Manwantaras, those termed Kalpas, and their subdivisions, and the four ages: the events that happen at the close of a Kalpa, and the terminations of the several ages: the histories, O great Muni, of the gods, the sages, and kings; and how the Vedas were divided into branches (or schools), after they had been arranged by Vyása: the duties of the Brahmans and the other tribes, as well as of those who pass through the different orders of life? All these things I wish to hear from you, grandson of Vasishtha. Incline thy thoughts benevolently towards me, that I may, through thy favour, be informed of all I desire to know.

Paráśara replied: Well inquired, pious Maitreya. You recall to-my recollection that which was of old narrated by my father's father, Vasishtha. I had heard that my father had been devoured by a Rákshasa employed by Viśwámitra. Violent anger seized me; and I commenced a sacrifice for the destruction of the Rákshasas. Hundreds of them were reduced to ashes by the rite; when, as they were about to be entirely extirpated, my grandfather Vasishtha thus spake to me: Enough, my child; let thy wrath be appeased: the Rákshasas are not culpable: thy father's death was the work of destiny. Anger is the passion of fools; it becometh not a wise man. By whom, it may be asked, is any one killed? Every man reaps the consequences of his own acts. Anger, my son, is the destruction of all that man obtains, by arduous exertions, of fame and of devout austerities, and prevents the attainment of heaven or of emancipation. The chief sages always shun wrath: be not thou, my child, subject to its influence. Let no more of these unoffending spirits of darkness be consumed.* Mercy is the might of the righteous. ¹

¹ Sacrifice of Parásara. The story of Parásara's birth is narrated in detail in the Mahábhárata (Ádi Parvan, s. 176). King Kalmáshapáda, meeting with Śakti, the son of Vasishtha, in a narrow path in a thicket, desired him to stand out of his way. The sage refused; on which the Rájá beat him with his whip; and Sakti cursed him to become a Rákshasa, a man-devouring spirit. The Rájá, in this transformation, killed and ate its author, or Sakti, together with all the other sons of Vasishtha. Śakti left his wife, Adriśyanti, pregnant; and she gave birth to Parásara, who was brought up by his grandfather. When he grew up, and was informed of his father's death, he instituted a sacrifice for the destruction of all the Rákshasas, but was dissuaded from its completion by Vasishtha and other sages, or Atri, Pulastya, Pulaha, and Kratu. The Mahábhárata adds, that, when he desisted from the rite, he scattered the remaining sacrificial fire upon the northern face of the Himálaya mountain, where it still blazes forth, at the phases of the moon, consuming Rákshasas, forests, and mountains. The legend alludes, possibly, to some trans-himalayan volcano. The transformation of Kalmáshapáda is ascribed, in other places, to a different cause; but he is everywhere regarded as the devourer of Sakti + or Śaktri, as the name also occurs. The story is told in the Linga

^{*} Supply: "Let this thy sacrifice cease": सर्व ते विरम्भेवतत्।
† This is hardly the name of a male. The right word seems to be Saktri.

Being thus admonished by my venerable grandsire, I immediately desisted from the rite, in obedience to his injunctions; and Vasishtha, the most excellent of sages, was content with me. Then arrived Pulastya,

Purána (Púrvárdha, s. 64) in the same manner, with the addition, conformably to the Śaiva tendency of that work, that Paráśara begins his sacrifice by propitiating Mahádeva. Vasishíha's dissuasion and Pulastya's appearance are given in the very words of our text; and the story concludes: 'Thus, through the favour of Pulastya and of the wise Vasishíha, Paráśara composed the Vaishnava (Vishnu) Purána, containing ten thousand stanzas, and being the third of the Purána compilations' (Purána-sanhitá).* The Bhágavata (b. III., s. 8) also alludes, though obscurely, to this legend. In recapitulating the succession of the narrators of part of the Bhágavata, Maitreya states, that this first Purána was communicated to him by his Guru, Paráśara, as he had been desired by Pulastya:

प्रोवाच महां स द्याजुरतो सुनिः (पराग्ररः) पुलस्त्येन पुराग्रमाद्यम् । i. e., according to the commentator, agreeably to the boon given by Pulastya to Paráśara, saying, 'You shall be a narrator of Puráńas'; (पुराग्यन्ता † भविष्यसि). The Mahábhárata makes no mention of the communication of this faculty to Paráśara by Pulastya; and, as the Bhágavata could not derive this particular

Whence proceeded animate and inanimate things? From Vishńu. Of what is the substance of the world? Vishńu. Into what has it been, and will it again be, resolved? Vishńu. He is, therefore, both the instrumental and material cause of the universe. 'The answer to the "whence" replies to the query as to the instrumental cause: "He is the world" replies to the inquiry as to the material cause': अनेन यत्यत्य निमित्तप्रस्थाता जगह स इतुपादानप्रस्थाताम् । 'And by this explanation of the agency of the materiality, &c. of Vishńu, as regards the universe, (it follows that) all will be produced from, and all will repose in, him': अनेनेव विष्णाः सर्वजगद्धादान स्थलतिवाः

Prayer of Paráśara to Vishńu. Successive narration of the Vishńu Puráńa. Explanation of Vásudeva: his existence before creation: his first manifestations. Development of effects; Mahat; Ahańkára; Tanmátras; elements; objects of sense; senses; of the mundane egg. Vishńu the same as Brahmá the creator; Vishńu the preserver; Rudra the destroyer.

Parasara said: Glory to the unchangeable, holy, eternal, supreme Vishnu, of one universal nature, the mighty over all: to him who is Hiranyagarbha, Hari, and Sankara, the creator, the preserver, and destroyer

The three hypostases of Vishnu. Hiranyagarbha (हिर्द्यान्त्र) is a name of Brahmá; he who was born from the golden egg. Hari (हिर्द्र) is Vishnu; and Śankara (ग्रंबर), Śiva. The Vishnu who is the subject of our text is the supreme being in all these three divinities or hypostases, in his different characters of creator, preserver, and destroyer. Thus, in the Márkandeya: "Accordingly, as the primal all-pervading spirit is distinguished by attributes in creation and the rest, so he obtains the denomination of Brahmá, Vishnu, and Śiva. In the capacity of Brahmá, he creates the worlds; in that of Rudra, he destroys them; in that of Vishnu, he is quiescent. These are the three Avasthás (lit., hypostases) of the self-born. Brahmá is the quality of activity; Rudra, that of darkness; Vishnu, the lord of the world, is goodness. So, therefore, the three gods are the three qualities.

The notion is one common to all antiquity, although less philosophically conceived, or, perhaps, less distinctly expressed, in the passages which have come down to us. The τρεῖς ἀρχικὰς ὑποστάσεις of Plato are said, by Cudworth (I., 111.), upon the authority of Plotinus, to be an ancient doctrine, παλαιὰ δόξα. And he also observes: "For, since Orpheus, Pythagoras, and Plato, who, all of them, asserted a trinity of divine hypostases, unquestionably derived much of their doctrine from the Egyptians, it may be reasonably suspected, that these Egyptians did the like before them." As, however, the Grecian accounts and those of the Egyptians are much more perplexed and unsatisfactory than those of the Hindus, it is most probable that we find amongst them the doctrine in its most original, as well as most methodical and significant, form.

- ¹ Jaganmaya, made up, or consisting substantially (其記), of the world. Maya is an affix denoting 'made' or 'consisting of'; as Káshthamaya, 'made of wood'. The world is, therefore, not regarded, by the Paurániks, as an emanation, or an illusion, but as consubstantial with its first cause.

The Mahábhárata interprets it, in one place, to mean 'he who is not distinct from final emancipation'; and, in another, to signify 'exempt from decay' (चयहोन). A commentator on the Kásíkhańda of the Skanda Puráńa explains it 'he who never declines (or varies) from his own proper nature:' सभावाद्ययवते।†

'By the nature of visible objects' (अथेखर्पण): Artha is explained by Drísya (दृश्ण), 'visible'; Swarúpena, by 'the nature of'. That is, visible objects are not what they seem to be, independent existences; they are essentially one with their original source; and knowledge of their true nature, or relation to Vishnu, is knowledge of Vishnu him-and lord of creation and preservation; the ruler of the world; unborn, imperishable, undecaying: * I will relate to you that which was originally imparted by the great father of all (Brahmá†), in answer to the questions of Daksha and other venerable sages, and repeated by them to Purukutsa, a king who reigned on the banks of the Narmadá. It was next related by him to Sáraswata, and by Sáraswata to me.1

Who can describe him who is not to be apprehended by the senses: who is the best of all things; the supreme soul, self-existent: who is devoid of all the distinguishing characteristics of complexion, caste, or the like; and is exempt from birth, vicissitude, death, or decay: who is always, and alone: who exists everywhere, and in whom all things here exist; and who is, thence, named Vásudeva?2 He is Brahself. This is not the doctrine of Máyá, or the influence of illusion, which alone, according to Vedánta idealism, constitutes belief in the existence of matter: a doctrine foreign to most of the Puranas, and first introduced amongst them, apparently, by the Bhágavata.

² The ordinary derivation of Vasudeva has been noticed above (p. 2). Here it is derived from Vas, 'to dwell,' from Vishnu's abiding in all things, and all in him: सर्ववासी समस्तं च वसत्यच । The Mahábhárata explains Vásu in the same manner, and Deva to signify radiant, shining: सर्वे जगदातानि वास-ma, 1 supreme, lord, eternal, unborn, imperishable, undecaying; of one essence; ever pure, as free from defects. He, that Brahma, was all things; comprehending in his own nature the indiscrete and discrete. He then existed in the forms of Purusha and of Kála. Purusha (spirit) is the first form of the supreme; next proceeded two other forms, the discrete and indiscrete; and Kála (time) was the last.* These four—Pradhána (primary

¹ The commentator argues, that Vásudeva must be the Brahma or supreme being of the Vedas, because the same circumstances

* तदेव सर्वमेवैतद्वाकायकस्वरूपवत् । तथा पुरुषरूपेण कालरूपेण च स्थितम् ॥ परस्य ब्रह्मणी रूपं पुरुषः प्रथमं दिज । यकायके तथैवान्ये रूपे कालस्वथापरम् ॥

Spirit, O twice-born, is the leading aspect of the supreme Brahma. The next is a twofold aspect, viz., prakriti, both evolved and unevolved; and time is the last."

It seems, therefore, not that prak/iti, spirit, and time originated from Brahma, but that Brahma offers itself under these modes of apprehension. These modes are coessential with Brahma.

The last line of the text cited above admitting of two interpretations, that has been chosen which harmonizes the doctrine of the writer of the Purana with the doctrine of his quotation in pp. 23—25, infra; for on that his own enunciation here undoubtedly is founded.

Professor Wilson adopted the following reading of the first line of the verses in question:

तदेतत्सर्वमेवासीद्यक्तायक्तस्वरूपवत्।

† These words have the appearance of being a glossarial expansion of an etymology given in the Mahábhárata, or some similar work. The or crude matter), Purusha (spirit), Vyakta (visible substance), and Kála (time)—the wise consider to be the pure and supreme condition of Vishńu.² These four forms, in their due proportions, are the causes of the production of the phenomena of creation, preservation, and destruction. Vishńu, being thus discrete and indiscrete substance, spirit, and time, sports like are predicated of both, as eternity, omnipresence, omnipotence, &c.; but he does not adduce any scriptural text with the name Vásudeva.

² Time is not usually enumerated, in the Puráńas, as an element of the first cause; but the Padma P. and the Bhágavata agree with the Vishúu in including it. It appears to have been regarded, at an earlier date, as an independent cause. The commentator on the Moksha Dharma cites a passage from the Vedas, which he understands to allude to the different theories of the cause of creation:

कालः स्वभावी नियतिर्यदृक्ता भूतानि योनिः पुरुषः।

Time, inherent nature, consequence of acts, self-will, elementary atoms, matter, and spirit, asserted, severally, by the Astrologers, the Buddhists, the Mimámsakas, the Jainas, the Logicians, the Sánkhyas, and the Vedántins. Koóros was also one of the first generated agents in creation, according to the Orphic theogony.

In the Mahábhárata, Śánti-parvan, 13169, we read:

कादयामि जगदिश्वं भूला सूर्य इवांशुभिः। सर्वभूताधिवासय वासुदैवस्ततो हाहम्॥

a playful boy, as you shall learn by listening to his frolics. 1

That chief principle (Pradhána), which is the indiscrete cause, is called, by the sages, also Prakŕiti (nature): it is subtile, uniform, and comprehends what is and what is not (or both causes and effects);* is durable, self-sustained, illimitable, undecaying, and stable; devoid of sound or touch, and possessing neither colour nor form; endowed with the three qualities (in equilibrium); the mother of the world; without beginning;² and that into which all that is produced

¹ The creation of the world is very commonly considered to be the Lilá (जीवा), sport or amusement, of the supreme being.

The attributes of Pradhána, the chief (principle or element), here specified, conform, generally, to those ascribed to it by the Sánkhya philosophy (Sánkhya Káriká, p. 16, &c.); although some of them are incompatible with its origin from a first cause. † In the Sánkhya, this incongruity does not occur; for there Pradhána is independent, and coordinate with primary spirit. The Puránas give rise to the inconsistency, by a lax use of both philosophical and pantheistical expressions. The most incongruous epithets in our text are, however, explained away in the comment. Thus, Nitya (निद्ध), 'eternal', is said to mean 'uniform, not liable to increase or diminution': निद्धं सद्वाद्धीनम् । Sadasadátmaka (सदसदात्वाक), 'comprehending what is and what is not', means 'having the power of both cause and effect' (जार्य-

^{*} The literal translation is this: "That which is the unevolved cause is emphatically called, by the most eminent sages, pradhána, original base, which is subtile prakřiti, viz., that which is eternal, and which at once is and is not, or is mere process."

The Sanskrit is in note 2 of this page. I cannot translate prakriti.

is resolved.* By that principle all things were in-

'without birth' (जनसून्य), not being engendered by any created thing, but proceeding immediately from the first cause. 'The mother', or, literally, 'the womb, of the world' (जनवान), means 'the passive agent in creation', operated on, or influenced, by the active will of the creator.† The first part of the passage in the text is a favourite one with several of the Puránas; but they modify it, and apply it after their own fashion. In the Vishnu, the original is:

ज्रवातं कारणं यत्तत्प्रधानमृषिसत्तमैः। प्रोच्यते प्रकृतिः सूच्या नित्यं सद्सदात्मकम्॥ rendered as above. The Váyu, Brahmánda, and Kúrma Puránas have:

चयतं कार्णं यत्तु नित्धं सद्सद्तात्मकम्। प्रधानं प्रकृतिं चैव यमाज्ञसत्त्वचिनाकाः॥

'The indiscrete cause, which is uniform, and both cause and effect, and whom those who are acquainted with first principles call Pradhána and Prakŕiti, is the uncognizable Brahma, who was before all': अविशेष ह्यापे समवता।§ But the application of two synonyms of Prakŕiti to Brahma seems unnecessary, at least. The Brahma P. corrects the reading, apparently: the first line is as before; the second is:

* Prabhavápyaya, "the place whence is the origination and into which is the resolution of all things." So says the commentator, and rightly.

Jagad-yoni, a little before, is scarcely so much "the mother of the world", or "the womb of the world", as "the material cause of the world." The commentator explains it by kárańa, "cause".

† It may be generally remarked, with regard to these explanations of terms used in the text, and expounded by the Hindu commentator, that, had Professor Wilson enjoyed the advantages which are now at the command of the student of Indian philosophy, unquestionably he would here have expressed himself differently. Thus, the reader will not find the "incongruity" and "inconsistency" complained of, if he bears in mind, that the text speaks of Brahma, not as putting forth evolutions, but as exhibiting different aspects of itself.

vested in the period subsequent to the last dissolution

प्रधानं पुरुषो यसाज्ञिमंसे विश्वमीदृश्म्।

The passage is placed absolutely: 'There was an indiscrete cause,—eternal, and cause and effect,—which was both matter and spirit (Pradhána and Purusha), from which this world was made.' Instead of देखां, 'such' or 'this', some copies read देखाः, 'from which Iswara or god (the active deity or Brahmá) made the world'. The Hari Vamsa has the same reading, except in the last term, which it makes देखाः; that is, according to the commentator, 'the world, which is Iswara, was made.' The same authority explains this indiscrete cause, Avyaktakárana, to denote Brahmá, 'the creator'; तं व विद्य ब्रह्माणं स्थारं सर्वभूतानास्। an identification very unusual, if not inaccurate, and possibly founded on misapprehension of what is stated by the Bhavishya P.:

यत्तत्वारणमयतं नित्यं सद्सदात्मकम् । तद्विशिष्टः स पुरुषो लोके ब्रह्मित कीर्त्यते ॥ एवं स भगवानण्ड इति ।

'That male or spirit which is endowed with that which is the indiscrete cause, &c., is known, in the world, as Brahmá: he, being in the egg', &c. The passage is precisely the same in Manu, I., 11.; except that we have 'Visrishta' instead of 'Visishtha'. The latter is a questionable reading, and is, probably, wrong; the sense of the former is, 'detached': and the whole means, very consistently, 'embodied spirit detached from the indiscrete cause of the world, is known as Brahmá'.* The Padma P. inserts the first line, राह्म के ..., but has:

* Visŕishťa, the only reading recognized by Kullúka and Medhátithi, commentators on the Mánava-dharma-śástra, means, as explained by them, utpádita, "produced" or "created".

The Mánava-dharma-sástra notably differs from the Sánkhya, in that it does not hold a duality of first principles. And still different are the Puránas, in which the dualistic principles are united in Brahma, and—as previously remarked—are not evolutions therefrom, but so many aspects of some supreme deity. See the Translator's first note in p. 15, supra.

of the universe, and prior to creation. For Brahmans learned in the Vedas, and teaching truly their doctrines, explain such passages as the following as intending the production of the chief principle (Pradhána). There was neither day nor night, nor sky nor earth, nor darkness nor light, nor any other thing, save only One, unapprehensible by intellect, or That which is Brahma and Pums (spirit) and Pradhána

'Which creates, undoubtedly, Mahat and the other qualities': assigning the first epithets, therefore, as the Vishńu does, to Prakŕiti only. The Linga† also refers the expression to Prakŕiti alone, but makes it a secondary cause:

ग्रयक्तं चेश्वरात्तसादभवत्वार्णं परम्। प्रधानं प्रकृतिश्चैव यदाङ्गसत्त्वचिन्तकाः॥

'An indiscrete cause, which those acquainted with first principles call Pradhána and Prakriti, proceeded from that Íswara (Śiva).' This passage is one of very many instances in which expressions are common to several Puránas, that seem to be borrowed from one another, or from some common source older than any of them; especially in this instance, as the same text occurs in Manu.;

तेनाचे सर्वमेवासीद्वाप्तं वै प्रलयादनु ।

The ellipses are filled up by the commentator. This, he adds, is to be regarded as the state of things at a Mahápralaya or total dissolution; leaving, therefore, crude matter, nature, or chaos, as a coexistent element with the Supreme. This, which is conformable to the philosophical doctrine, is not, however, that of the Puránas in general, nor that of our text, which states

^{*} Read: "Which creates all, from mahat to individual existences: such is the conclusion of the scriptures."

(matter).1 The two forms which are other than

(b. VI., c. 4), that, at a Prákřita or elementary dissolution, Pradhána itself merges into the deity.* Neither is it, apparently, the doctrine of the Vedas, although their language is somewhat equivocal.

1 The metre here is one common to the Vedas, Trishtubh; but, in other respects, the language is not characteristic of those compositions. The purport of the passage is rendered somewhat doubtful by its close and by the explanation of the commentator. The former is: एकं प्राधानिकं ब्रह्म प्रमांखढासीत । 'One Prádhánika Brahma Spirit: THAT, was.' The commentator explains Prádhánika, Pradhána eva, the same word as Pradhána; but it is a derivative word, which may be used attributively, implying 'having, or conjoined with, Pradhana'. The commentator, however, interprets it as the substantive; for he adds: 'There was Pradhána and Brahma and Spirit; this triad was at the period of dissolution': प्रधानं ब्रह्म च प्रमांश्वित चयमेव तदा प्रलंश आसीत ।† He evidently, however, understands their conjoint existence as one only; for he continues: 'So, according to the Vedas, then there was neither the non-existent cause nor the existent effect': तथा च श्रुति:। नासदासीझी सदासीत्तदानीम ।

The evolutionary doctrine is not the Paurannik; and the commentator—who, on this occasion, does little more than supply ellipses, and does not call prakriti, "at a Mahapralaya", "a coexistent element with the Supreme"—advances nothing in contradiction to the tenor of the Puranas. See the editor's second note in p. 21, and note in p. 22, supra.

[†] It is the abridged comment that is here cited. In the copy of it to which I have access, the passage extracted above begins: प्राधानिकं प्रधानस्व। प्राधानिकं ब्रह्म च। The fuller comment has: प्राधानिकं खार्थ तिह्नतः। the essence of unmodified Vishńu are Pradhána (matter) and Purusha (spirit); and his other form, by which those two are connected or separated, is called Kála (time)." When discrete substance is aggregated in crude nature, as in a foregone dissolution, that dissolution is meaning that there was only One Being, in whom matter and its modifications were all comprehended.

नाहो न राचिन नभो न भूमि-नासीत्तमो ज्योतिरभूत चान्यत्। श्रोचादिनुद्धाबुपनभ्यमेनं प्राधानिनं ब्रह्म पुमांसदासीत्॥ विष्णोः खरूपात्परतो हि ते ऽन्ये रूपे प्रधानं पुरूषश्च विष्र। तसीव ते ऽन्ये न धृते वियुत्ते रूपाटि यन्तदिन कानसंज्ञम॥

"There was neither day nor night, neither heaven nor earth, neither darkness nor light. And there was not aught else apprehensible by the senses or by the mental faculties. There was then, however, one Brahma, essentially prakriti and spirit. For the two aspects of Vishnu which are other than his supreme essential aspect are prakriti and spirit, O Brahman. When these two other aspects of his no longer subsist, but are dissolved, then that aspect whence form and the rest, i. e., creation, proceed anew is denominated time, O twice-born."

See the editor's first note in p. 18, supra.

I have carried forward the inverted commas by which Professor Wilson indicated the end of the quotation. There can be no question that it embraces two stanzas. They are in the trishtubh metre, and are preceded and followed by verses in the anushtubh.

termed elemental (Prákrita). The deity as Time is without beginning, and his end is not known; and from him the revolutions of creation, continuance, and dissolution unintermittingly succeed:* for, when, in the latter season, the equilibrium of the qualities (Pradhána) exists, and spirit (Pums) is detached from matter, then the form of Vishnu which is Time abides. Then

सत्तं रजसमयीव गुणचयमुदाहृतम्। साम्यावस्थितिरेषां प्रकृतिः परिकीर्तिता॥

This state is synonymous with the non-evolution of material products, or with dissolution; implying, however, separate existence, and detached from spirit. This being the case, it is asked, What should sustain matter and spirit whilst separate, or renew their combination so as to renovate creation? It is answered, Time, which is when everything else is not, and which, at the end of a certain interval, unites Matter (Pradhána) and Purusha, and

* अव्यक्तिज्ञासतस्ति सर्गस्थित्यनसंयमाः।

We here have a reference, apparently, to four—not simply to three—conditions of things, the last of which, samyama, "delitescence", denotes the state that prevails during the nights of Brahma, when all concrete forms are resolved into their original elements. The word has occurred before: see p. 11, supra. Also see the Márkańdeya-purána, XLVI., 7.

The commentator, at first, takes sainyama - i. e., he says, sainhára—for the third condition, qualified by anta=ante, "at last". Alternatively, he makes anta the third of the conditions, and governs the names of all three by sainyamāk, in the sense of niyamāk. For niyama, in place of sainyama, in a classification similar to that of the text, see Sankara Achārya's Commentary on the Swetāswatara Upanishad: Bibliotheca Indica, Vol. VII., pp. 275 and 276.

† On rendering the Sánkhya or Pauráńik guňa, as here meant, by "quality", see my translation of Pandit Nehemiah Nílakańtha Śastrin's Rational Refutation of the Hindu Philosophical Systems, pp. 43 and 44, foot-note, and pp. 219 et seg., foot-note.

the supreme Brahma, the supreme soul, the substance of the world,* the lord of all creatures, the universal soul, the supreme ruler, Hari, of his own will having entered into matter and spirit, agitated the mutable and immutable principles, the season of creation being arrived. In the same manner as fragrance affects the mind from its proximity merely, and not from any immediate operation upon mind itself, so the Supreme influenced the elements of creation. Purushottama produces creation. Conceptions of this kind are evidently comprised in the Orphic triad, or the ancient notion of the cooperation of three such principles, in creation, as Phanes or Eros, which is the Hindu spirit or Purusha; Chaos, matter or Pradhána; and Chronos, or Kála, time.

¹ Pradhána is styled Vyaya (अय), 'that which may be expended';† or Parińámin (परिणासिन), 'which may be modified': and Purusha is called Avyaya (अयय), 'inconsumable', or aparińámin (अपरिणासिन), 'immutable'. The expressions प्रविक्ष, 'having entered into', and चीभयमास, 'agitated', recall the mode in which divine intelligence, mens, vovç, was conceived, by the ancients, to operate upon matter:

or as in a more familiar passage:

Spiritus intus alit, totamque infusa per artus,

Mens agitat molem, et magno se corpore miscet:

or, perhaps, it more closely approximates to the Phœnician cosmogony, in which a spirit, mixing with its own principles, gives rise to creation. Brucker, I., 240. As presently explained, the mixture is not mechanical; it is an influence or effect exerted upon intermediate agents which produce effects; as perfumes do not delight the mind by actual contact, but by the impression is both the agitator and the thing to be agitated; being present in the essence of matter, both when it is conthey make upon the sense of smelling, which communicates it to the mind. The entrance of the supreme Vishńu into spirit, as well as matter, is less intelligible than the view elsewhere taken of it, as the infusion of spirit, identified with the Supreme, into Prakŕiti or matter alone. Thus, in the Padma Puráńa:*

यो ४सी प्रक्रताः पुरुषः प्रोच्यते स रहाच्युतः। स एव भगवान्विष्णुः प्रक्रतामाविवेश ह ॥

'He who is called the male (spirit) of Prakriti is here named Achyuta; and that same divine Vishnu entered into Prakriti.' So the Brihan Naradiya:

प्रक्रती चीभमापने पुरुषाखी जगनुरी।

'The lord of the world, who is called Purusha, producing agitation in Prakriti.' From the notion of influence or agitation produced on matter through or with spirit, the abuse of personification led to actual or vicarious admixture. Thus, the Bhágavata, identifying Máyá with Prakriti, has:

कालवृत्त्या तु मायायां मुणमय्यामधोचनः। पुरुषेणात्मभूतेन वीर्यमाधत्त वीर्यवान्॥

'Through the operation of time, the Mighty One, who is present to the pure, implanted a seed in Máyá endowed with qualities, as Purusha, which is one with himself.' † B. III., s. 5. And the Bhavishya: 'Some learned men say, that the supreme being, desirous to create beings, creates, in the commencement of the Kalpa, a body of soul (or an incorporeal substance); which soul, created by him, enters into Prakriti; and Prakriti, being thereby agitated, creates many material elements':

जन्ये चेदं महावाही प्रवदन्ति मगीषिणः। यो ऽसावात्मा परसात्मस्यादी सृवते तनुम् ॥

^{*} Uttara-kańda, XXXIV.

[†] Burnouf—Vol. I., p. 176—has: "Lorsque l'action du temps eut développé au sein de Mâyâ les qualités, Adhôkchaja, doué de vigueur, se manifestant sous la forme de Purucha, déposa en elle sa semence."

For Adhokshaja, see Goldstücker's Sanskrit Dictionary, sub voce: also Original Sanskrit Texts, Part IV., pp. 182 and 183.

tracted and expanded. Vishnu, supreme over the supreme, is of the nature of discrete forms in the atomic productions, Brahmá and the rest (gods, men, &c.).

Then from that equilibrium of the qualities (Pradhána), presided over by soul, proceeds the unequal development of those qualities (constituting the principle Mahat or Intellect) at the time of creation. The

पुत्रक्ख महावाही सिमृचुर्विविधाः प्रजाः। तेन सृष्टः पुत्रक्कु प्रधानं विश्तते नृप ॥ प्रधानं चीभितं तेन सृजते विकारान्वह्नन्।

But these may be regarded as notions of a later date. In the Mahábhárata, the first cause is declared to be 'Intellectual', who creates by his mind or will:

मानसो नाम पूर्वो ऽपि विश्वतो नै सहर्षिभिः। श्रनादिनिधनो देवसाथाभेवो ऽजरामरः॥

'The first (being) is called Mánasa (intellectual), and is so celebrated by great sages: he is god, without beginning or end, indivisible, immortal, undecaying.' And again:

प्रजाविसंगे विविधं मानसी मनसी ऽ सजत ।

'The Intellectual created many kinds of creatures by his mind.'

² The term here is Kshetrajna, 'embodied spirit', or that which knows the Kshetra or 'body'; implying the combination of spirit with form or matter, for the purpose of creating.

3 The first product of Pradhána, sensible to divine, though not to mere human, organs, is, both according to the Sánkhya and Pauráńik doctrines, the principle called Mahat, literally, 'the Great'; explained in other places, as in our text, 'the production of the manifestation of the qualities': गुज्यसनसंभृति । or, as in the Váyu:

Chief principle then invests that Great principle, Intellect; and it becomes threefold, as affected by the quality of goodness, foulness, or darkness, and invested

गुणभावाद्यमानो महान्प्रादुर्वभूव ह। We have, in the same Puráńa, as well as in the Brahmáńda and Linga, a number of synonyms for this term, as:

* This stanza occurs in the fourth chapter of the Váyu-purána. Immediately following it are these definitions, which Professor Wilson has translated:

They are also explained, though not very distinctly, to the following purport: "Manas is that which considers the conse-published in the Bibliotheca Indica -, p. 117.

The Linga-purána, Prior Section, LXX., 12 et seq., differs from the Váyu in having brahma and chit-para or viśweśa instead of brahma and vipura. Its explanations of the terms also present several deviations. For activities, in definition of vipura, it gives:

इन्द्रानां चित्परीभावाचित्परं प्रोच्यते बुधैः। or, agreeably to another reading:

बन्धनाद्यरीभावादीयरः प्रोच्यते बुधैः।
With nothing correspondent to the next two stanzas and a half of the Váyu, it then passes at once to the line beginning with परायवाचिः
In the same Purana, Prior Section, VIII., 67—74, we read:

विखरनु महान्प्रज्ञा मनो ब्रह्म चितिः स्नृतिः। स्नातः संवित्ततः पश्चादीश्वरो मितिरव च ॥ वृद्धेरेताः द्विजाः संज्ञा महतः परिकीर्तिताः। सन्धा वृद्धेरेताः द्विजाः संज्ञा महतः परिकीर्तिताः। सन्धा वृद्धेः प्रसादस्तु प्राणायामेन सिद्धाति॥ विखरो विखरीमावाहून्द्वानां मुनिसत्तमाः। स्रयजः सर्वतत्त्वानां महान्यः परिसंमतः॥ यत्ममाण्गृहा प्रज्ञा मनस्तु मनृते यतः। वृंहण्यवाहूहत्वाच ब्रह्म ब्रह्मविद् वराः॥ सर्वकर्माण्यं भोगार्थं यचिनोति चितिः स्नृता। सर्वकर्माण्यं भोगार्थं यचिनोति चितिः स्नृता। सर्वतं यत्भ्यतः सर्व संविद्धे विन्दते यतः॥

From the great principle (Mahat) Intellect, threefold

quences of acts to all creatures, and provides for their happiness. Mahat, the Great principle, is so termed from being the first of the created principles, and from its extension being greater than that of the rest. Mati is that which discriminates and distinguishes objects preparatory to their fruition by Soul. Brahmá implies that which effects the development and augmentation of created things. Pur is that by which the concurrence of nature occupies and fills all bodies. Buddhi is that which communicates to soul the knowledge of good and evil. Khyáti is the means of individual fruition, or the faculty of discriminating objects by appropriate designations and the like. Iswara is that which knows all things as if they were present. Prajná is that by which the properties of things are known. Chiti is that by which the consequences of acts and species of knowledge are selected for the use of soul. Smriti is the faculty of recognizing all things, past, present, or to come. Samvid is that in which all things are found or known, and which is found or known in all things: and Vipura is that which is free from the effects of contrarieties, as of knowledge and ignorance, and the like. Mahat is also called Iśwara, from its exercising supremacy over all things; Bháva, from its elementary existence; Eka, or 'the one', from its singleness; Purusha, from its abiding within the body; and, from its being ungenerated, it is called Swayambhu."* Now, in this

The terms thus enumerated and elucidated - viswara, mahat, prajná, manas, brahma, chiti, smříti, khyáti, samvid, iswara, and mati - belong, as they here stand, to the Yoga philosophy.

* The reader will be able to verify this translation by the original given at the beginning of the last note. Brahma—which comes between iswara and bhava—was overlooked. Further, for "Eka" read saka, meaning the same thing, "one."

Egotism, (Ahamkára), denominated Vaikárika, 'pure'; Taijasa, 'passionate'; and Bhútádi, 'rudimental', is pro-nomenclature we have chiefly two sets of words; one, as Manas, Buddhi, Mati, signifying mind, intelligence, knowledge, wisdom, design; and the other, as Brahmá, Íśwara, &c., denoting an active creator and ruler of the universe: as the Váyu adds,

महान्सृष्टिं विकुष्ते चीवमानः सिसृचया।

'Mahat, impelled by the desire to create, causes various creation': and the Mahabharata has: सहान्सर्जाहंकार्स। 'Mahat created Ahańkára.' The Puráńas generally employ the same expression, attributing to Mahat or Intelligence the act of creating. is, therefore, the divine mind in creative operation, the vove of διαχόσμων τε καὶ πάντων αίτιος of Anaxagoras; 'an ordering and disposing mind, which was the cause of all things.' The word itself suggests some relationship to the Phœnician Mot, which, like Mahat, was the first product of the mixture of spirit and matter, and the first rudiment of creation: "Ex connexione autem ejus spiritus prodiit Mot . . . Hinc  seminium omnis creaturæ et omnium rerum creatio." Brucker, I., 240. Mot, it is true, appears to be a purely material substance; whilst Mahat is an incorporeal + substance: but they agree in their place in the cosmogony, and are something alike in name. How far, also, the Phœnician system has been accurately described, is matter of uncertainty. See Sánkhya Káriká, p. 83.

^{*} In strict literality, "origin of the elements." See my edition of the Sankhya-sara—in the Bibliotheca Indica—, Preface, p. 31, foot-note.

duced; the origin of the (subtile) elements, and of the organs of sense; invested, in consequence of its three qualities, by Intellect, as Intellect is by the Chief principle.² Elementary Egotism, then becoming productive, as the rudiment of sound, produced from it Ether, * of which sound is the characteristic, investing it with its rudiment of sound. † Ether, becoming productive, en-

The equivalent employed by Mr. Colebrooke, egotism, has the advantage of an analogous etymology; Ahańkára being derived from Ahań (河夏), 'I'; as in the Hari Vańśa:

अहं लिति स होवाच प्रजाः सच्चामि भारत।

'He (Brahmá), O Bhárata, said, I will create creatures.' See also S. Káriká, p. 91.

² These three varieties of Ahańkára are also described in the Sánkhya Káriká, p. 92. Vaikárika, that which is productive, or susceptible of production, is the same as the Sáttwika, or that which is combined with the property of goodness. Taijasa Ahańkára is that which is endowed with Tejas, 'heat' or 'energy', in consequence of its having the property of Rajas, 'passion' or 'activity'; and the third kind, Bhútádi, or 'elementary', is the Támasa, or has the property of darkness. From the first kind proceed the senses; from the last, the rudimental unconscious elements; both kinds, which are equally of themselves inert, being ^{* &}quot;A characterization of ákáśa will serve to show how inadequatively it is represented by 'ether'. In dimension, it is, as has been said, infinite; it is not made up of parts; and colour, taste, smell, and tangibility do not appertain to it. So far forth it corresponds exactly to time, space, Íśwara, and soul. Its speciality, as compared therewith, consists in its being the material cause of sound. Except for its being so, we might take it to be one with vacuity." Rational Refutation, &c., p. 120.

[&]quot;In Hindu opinion, the 'ether' is always essentially colourless and pure, and only from error is supposed to possess hue.  The ignorant, it is said, think the blueness of the sky to be the befoulment of 'ether'." Ibid., p. 272.

gendered the rudiment of touch; whence originated strong wind, the property of which is touch; and Ether, with the rudiment of sound, enveloped the rudiment of touch. Then wind, becoming productive, produced the rudiment of form (colour); whence light (or fire) proceeded, of which, form (colour) is the attribute; and the rudiment of touch enveloped the wind with the rudiment of colour. Light, becoming productive, produced the rudiment of taste; whence proceed all juices in which flavour resides; and the rudiment of colour invested the juices with the rudiment of taste. The waters, becoming productive, engendered the rudiment of smell; whence an aggregate (earth) originates, of which smell is the property. In each several ele-rendered productive by the cooperation of the second, the energetic or active modification of Ahańkára, which is, therefore, said to be the origin of both the senses and the elements.*

¹ The successive series of rudiments and elements, and their respectively engendering the rudiments and elements next in order, occur in most of the Puránas, in nearly the same words. The Břihan Náradíya P. observes:

यथानमं कारणतामेनीनस्वीपयान्ति वै।

'They (the elements) in successive order acquire the property of causality one to the other.' The order is also the same; or, ^{*} Ahankára, "the conception of I", has a preponderance either of sattwa, "pure quietude", or of rajas, "activity", or of tamas, "stagnancy". The first species, as likewise the third, becomes productive, when assisted by the second. Such is the genuine Sánkhya doctrine. In the Puráńas, the second, besides serving as an auxiliary to production, of itself produces; since therefrom arise five "intellectual organs" and five "organs of action." These organs, with manas, "the organ of imagination", are derived, in the unmodified Sánkhya, from the first species of ahankára. See, for additional details, the Sánkhya-sára, Preface, pp. 30 et seg., foot-note.

ment resides its peculiar rudiment; thence the property

ether (Ákása), wind or air (Váyu), fire or light (Tejas), water and earth; except in one passage of the Mahábhárata (Moksha Dharma, c. 9), where it is ether, water, fire, air, earth.* The order of Empedocles was: ether, fire, earth, water, air. Cudworth, I., 97. The investment (Ávarana) of each element by its own rudiment, and of each rudiment by its preceding gross and rudimental elements, is also met with in most of the chief Puránas, as the Váyu, Padma, Linga, and Bhágavata; and traces of it are found amongst the ancient cosmogonists; for Anaximander supposed that, 'when the world was made, a certain sphere or flame of fire, separated from matter (the Infinite), encompassed the air, which invested the earth as the bark does a tree': Κατὰ τὴν γένεσιν τοῦδε τοῦ κόσμου ἀποκριθήναι, καί τινα ἐκ τούτου φλογὸς σφαῖραν περιφυήναι τῷ περὶ τὴν γῆν ἀέρι, ὡς τῷ δένδρω φλοιόν. Euseb., Pr., I., 15. Some of the Puranas, as the Matsya, Vayu, Linga, Bhágavata, and Márkaúdeya, add a description of a participation of properties amongst the elements, which is rather Vedánta than Sánkhya. According to this notion, the elements add to their characteristic properties those of the elements which precede them. Ákása has the single property of sound: air has those of touch and sound: fire has colour, touch, and sound: water has taste, colour, touch, and sound: and earth has smell and the rest, thus having five properties: or, as the Linga P.+ describes the series:

> त्राकाशं शब्दमानं यत्तत्सर्शमानमानिशतः । दिगुणसु ततो वायुः शब्दस्पर्शायको ऽभवत् ॥ रूपं तथैवाविशतां शब्दस्पर्शगणानुभौ । त्रिगुणस ततस्विधः स शब्दस्पर्शरूपवान् ॥ शब्दस्पर्शरूपमानं रसमानं समाविशत् । तस्माचतुर्गुणा त्रापो विज्ञेयासु रसाविकाः ॥

of tanmátratá¹ (type or rudiment) is ascribed to these elements. Rudimental elements are not endowed with qualities; and therefore they are neither soothing, nor terrific, nor stupefying.²* This is the elemental creation, proceeding from the principle of egotism affected by

शब्दस्य भं च रूपं च रसस गन्धमाविश्वत् । सङ्गता गन्धमावेण त्राविश्वनो महीमिमाम् ॥ तस्रात्पञ्चगुणा भूमिः स्थूबभूतेषु शस्त्रते । शाना घोरास मूढास विशेषासेन ते स्थूताः॥

¹ Tanmátra, 'rudiment' or 'type', from Tad (तद), 'that', for Tasmin (तस्मन्), 'in that' gross element, and mátrá (माना), 'subtile or rudimental form' (माना सूचां रूपम्).† The rudiments are also the characteristic properties of the elements: as the Bhágavata:

तस्य मात्रा गुणः प्रव्दो लिङ्गं यह ष्टृहस्ययोः।

'The rudiment of it (ether) is also its quality, sound; as a common designation may denote both a person who sees an object, and the object which is to be seen: that is, according to the commentator, suppose a person behind a wall called aloud, "An elephant! an elephant!" the term would equally indicate that an elephant was visible, and that somebody saw it. Bhág., II., 5, 25.

² The properties here alluded to are not those of goodness, &c., but other properties § assigned to perceptible objects by the Sánkhya doctrines; or Śánti (भानि), 'placidity', Ghoratá (भारता), 'terror', and Moha (सोह), 'dulness' or 'stupefaction'. S. Káriká, v. 38, p. 119.

^{*} Śánta, ghora, múdha; "placid, commoved, torpid." Probably ghora is connected with ghúrh, "to whirl."

[†] With greater likelihood, tan-mátra, "merely transcendental", is from tanu and mátra, the latter considered as an affix; the u of tanu being elided, as it is, for instance, in tanmah for tanumah, and in similar conjugational forms of the fifth and eighth classes.

^{*} Rather: "Sound is its rudiment and also its quality."

^{§ &}quot;Goodness, &c." are causes; the "other properties", effects.

the property of darkness. The organs of sense are said to be the passionate products of the same principle, affected by foulness; and the ten divinities proceed from egotism affected by the principle of goodness; as does Mind, which is the eleventh. The organs of sense are ten: of the ten, five are the skin, eye, nose, tongue, and ear; the object of which, combined with Intellect, is the apprehension of sound and the rest: the organs of excretion and procreation, the hands, the feet, and the voice, form the other five; of which excretion, generation, manipulation, motion, and speaking are the several acts.

Then, ether, air, light, water, and earth, severally united with the properties of sound and the rest, existed as distinguishable according to their qualities, as soothing, terrific, or stupefying; but, possessing various energies and being unconnected, they could not, without combination, create living beings, not having blended with each other. Having combined, therefore, with one another, they assumed, through their mutual association, the character of one mass of entire unity; and, from the direction of spirit, with the acquiescence of the indiscrete Principle, ² Intellect and the rest, to the

² Avyaktánugraheńa (अयकानुग्रहण). The expression is something equivocal; as Avyakta may here apply either to the First gross elements inclusive, formed an egg, which gradually expanded like a bubble of water. This vast egg, O sage, compounded of the elements, and resting on the waters, was the excellent natural abode of Vishńu in the form of Brahmá; and there Vishńu, the lord of the universe, whose essence is inscrutable, assumed a perceptible form; and even he himself abided in it, in

Cause or to matter. In either case, the notion is the same; and the aggregation of the elements is the effect of the presidence of spirit, without any active interference of the indiscrete principle. The Avyakta is passive, in the evolution and combination of Mahat and the rest. Pradhana is, no doubt, intended; but its identification with the Supreme is also implied. The term Anugraha may also refer to a classification of the order of creation, which will be again adverted to.

1 It is impossible not to refer this notion to the same origin as the widely diffused opinion of antiquity, of the first manifestation of the world in the form of an egg. "It seems to have been a favourite symbol, and very ancient; and we find it adopted among many nations". Bryant, III., 165. Traces of it occur amongst the Syrians, Persians, and Egyptians; and, besides the Orphic egg amongst the Greeks, and that described by Aristophanes, Τίπτει πρώτιστον ὑπηνέμιον νὺξ ή μελανόπτερος ώὸν. part of the ceremony in the Dionysiaca and other mysteries consisted of the consecration of an egg; by which, according to Porphyry, was signified the world: Έρμηνεύει δὲ τὸ ώὸν τὸν μόσμον. Whether this egg typified the ark, as Bryant and Faber suppose, is not material to the proof of the antiquity and wide diffusion of the belief, that the world, in the beginning, existed in such a figure. A similar account of the first aggregation of the elements in the form of an egg is given in all the Puránas, with the usual epithet Haima or Hiranya, 'golden', as it occurs in Manu., I, 9.

the character of Brahmá. Its womb, vast as the mountain Meru, was composed of the mountains; and the mighty oceans were the waters that filled its cavity. In that egg, O Brahman, were the continents and seas and mountains, the planets and divisions of the universe, the gods, the demons, and mankind. And this egg was externally invested by seven natural envelopes; or by water, air, fire, ether, and Ahamkára, the origin of the elements, each tenfold the extent of that which it invested; next came the principle of Intelligence; and, finally, the whole was surrounded by the indiscrete Principle: resembling, thus, the cocoa-nut, filled interiorly with pulp, and exteriorly covered by husk and rind.

^{*} The reading of many MSS. and of the commentator, and that which seems to claim the preference, is:

[&]quot;Meru was its amnion, and the other mountains were its chorion."

[†] The word ahamkara is supplied to the original by the translator. The commentary is silent.

[‡] A new translation of this entire paragraph and of the first sentence of the next will be seen in Original Sanskrit Texts, Pert IV., pp. 34 and 35.

Affecting then the quality of activity, Hari, the lord of all, himself becoming Brahmá, engaged in the creation of the universe. Vishúu, with the quality of goodness, and of immeasurable power, preserves created things through successive ages, until the close of the period termed a Kalpa; when the same mighty deity, Janárdana, invested with the quality of darkness, assumes the awful form of Rudra, and swallows up the universe. Having thus devoured all things, and converted the world into one vast ocean, the Supreme reposes upon his mighty serpent-couch amidst the deep: he awakes after a season, and, again, as Brahmá, becomes the author of creation.*

Thus the one only god, Janárdana, takes the designation of Brahmá, Vishňu, and Śiva, accordingly as he creates, preserves, or destroys.² Vishňu, as creator,

¹ Janárdana is derived from Jana (जन), 'men', and Ardana (अट्न),† 'worship'; 'the object of adoration to mankind'.

² This is the invariable doctrine of the Puránas, diversified only according to the individual divinity to whom they ascribe identity with Paramátman or Parameśwara. In our text, this is * Almost the whole of this chapter and of the next occurs, often nearly word for word, in the Márkańdeya-puráńa, XLV. et seq.

[†] बहन signifies "solicitation". But there are preferable derivations of Janárdana. For instance, Śankara Áchárya, in his gloss on the thousand names of Vishúu enumerated in the Anuśásana-parvan of the Mahábhárata, takes its constituent jana, "people", to stand for "the wicked", and interprets ardana by "chastiser or extirpator". His words, in part, are: जनान्द्रजनान्द्यति हिन्छि । According to the Mahábhárata itself, in another place, Vásudeva is called Janárdana because of his striking terror into the Dasyus. See Original Sanskrit Texts, Part IV., pp. 182 and 183.

creates himself; as preserver, preserves himself; as destroyer, destroys himself at the end of all things. This world of earth, air, fire, water, ether, the senses, and the mind; all that is termed spirit; —that also is the lord of all elements, the universal form, 2 and imperishable. Hence he is the cause of creation, preservation, and destruction; and the subject of the vicissitudes inherent in elementary nature. He is the object and Vishóu; in the Śaiva Puráńas, as in the Linga, it is Śiva; in the Brahma Vaivarta, it is Kŕishóa. The identification of one of the hypostases with the common source of the triad was an incongruity not unknown to other theogonies: for Cneph, amongst the Egyptians, appears, on the one hand, to have been identified with the supreme being, the indivisible unity; whilst, on the other, he is confounded with both Emeph and Ptha, the second and third persons of the triad of hypostases. Cudworth, I., 4. 18.

- 'The world that is termed spirit'; " your is to dead, be explained, by the commentator, your indeed, bears the appellation spirit'; conformably to the text of the Vedas, you vet that I 'this universe is, indeed, spirit'. This is rather Vedanta than Sánkhya, and appears to deny the existence of matter. And so it does, as an independent existence; for the origin and end of infinite substance is the deity or universal spirit: but it does not therefore imply the non-existence of the world as real substance.
- ² Vishnu is both Bhutesa (), 'lord of the elements', or of created things, and Viswarupa (), 'universal substance'. He is, therefore, as one with sensible things, subject to his own control.

author of creation: he preserves, destroys, and is preserved. He, Vishńu, as Brahmá, and as all other beings, is infinite form. He is the Supreme, the giver of all good, the fountain of all happiness.

Maitreya.—How can creative agency be attributed to that Brahma who is without qualities, illimitable, pure, and free from imperfection?

Parasara.—The essential properties of existent things are objects of observation, of which no fore-knowledge is attainable; and creation and hundreds of properties belong to Brahma,  as inseparable parts of his essence; as heat, O chief of sages, is inherent in fire.

¹ Agency depends upon the Rajo-guńa, the quality of foulness or passion, which is an imperfection. Perfect being is void of all qualities, and is, therefore, inert:

Omnis enim per se divom natura necesse est Immortali ævo summa cum pace fruatur.

But, if inert for ever, creation could not occur. The objection is rather evaded than answered. The ascribing to Brahma of innumerable and unappreciable properties is supported, by the com-

The origin of creation is also imputed, in the Vedas, to the rise of will or desire in the Supreme: सो ऽकामयत बङ्ग खाँ प्रजायेय। 'He wished, I may become manifold, I may create creatures.' The Bhágavata expresses the same doctrine: 'The supreme being was before all things alone, the soul and lord of spiritual substance. In consequence of his own will, he is secondarily defined, as if of various minds':

Brahmá is said to be born: a familiar phrase, to signify his manifestation; and, as the peculiar measure of his presence, a hundred of his years is said to constitute his life. That period is also called Para, and the

This will, however, in the mysticism of the Bhagavata, is personified as Máyá:

सा वा एतस्य संद्रष्टुः भ्रतिः सद्सद्ातिका। माया नाम महाभाग यथेदं निर्ममे विभुः॥

'She (that desire) was the energy of the Supreme, who was contemplating (the uncreated world); and, by her, whose name is Máyá, the lord made the universe.' This, which was, at first, a mere poetical personification of the divine will, came, in such works as the Bhágavata, to denote a female divinity, coequal and coeternal with the First Cause. It may be doubted if the Vedas authorize such a mystification; and no very decided vestige of it occurs in the Vishíu Purána.

Burnouf translates the stanza in these words: "Au commencement cet univers était Bhagavat, l'âme et le souverain maître de toutes les âmes; Bhagavat existait seul sans qu'aucun attribut le manifestât, parce que tout désir était éteint en son cœur."

The commentator on the Bhágavata, Śridhara Swámin, explains the latter part of the stanza in three ways: तच सृष्टिलीलां वर्णयितं ततः पूर्वावस्थासाह । इदं विश्वसये सृष्टेः पूर्व परसाता अगवानेक एवास । आसीत् । आत्मनां जीवानामाता स्वरूपं विभः स्वामी च । नान्यह्रष्टुहुम्थात्मकं किंचिद्रासीत् । कारणात्मनासन्ते ऽपि पृथकप्रतीत्यभावादित्याह । जनानासत्यपन्त्रस्थाः । नानाद्र ष्टुहुम्थाद्र मतिभिनीपन्त्रस्थात् इति । तथा यदा । ज्ञानप्रश्चेषं विनेवायमर्थः । यः सृष्टी नानामितिभिष्पन्त्रस्थे स्वते एवासीदिति कृतः । आत्मेक्षा माया । तस्या अनुगती नये सित । यदा । जात्मन एकाकित्यनावस्था नेक्कायामनुन्वत्तायामित्यर्थः ।

* Bhágavata-purána, III, 5, 25. Burnouf's translation is as follows: "Or l'énergie de cet être doué de vue, énergie qui est à la fois ce qui existe et ce qui n'existe pas [pour nos organes], c'est là ce qui se nomme Mâyâ, et c'est par elle, illustre guerrier, que l'Être qui pénètre toutes choses créa cet univers."

half of it, Parárdha. I have already declared to you, O sinless Brahman, that Time is a form of Vishńu. Hear, now, how it is applied to measure the duration of Brahmá and of all other sentient beings, as well as of those which are unconscious; as the mountains, oceans, and the like.

O best of sages, fifteen twinklings of the eye make a Káshíhá; thirty Káshíhás, one Kalá; and thirty Kalás, one Muhúrta.² Thirty Muhúrtas constitute a day and 15 Nimeshas = 1 Káshthá.

30 Káshthás = 1 Kalá.

30 Kalás = 1 Kshańa.

12 Kshańas = 1 Muhúrta.

30 Muhurtas = 1 day and night.

In the Mahábhárata, Moksha Dharma, it is said that thirty Kalás and one-tenth, or, according to the commentator, thirty Kalás and three Káshíhás, make a Muhúrta. A still greater variety, ¹ This term is also applied to a different and still more protracted period. See b. VI., c. 3.

² The last proportion is rather obscurely expressed: तालु चिंग्रसीहर्तिको विधि:। 'Thirty of them (Kalás) are the rule for the Muhúrta'. The commentator says it means that thirty Kalás make a Ghatiká (or Gharí); and two Ghatikás, a Muhúrta: but his explanation is gratuitous, and is at variance with more explicit passages elsewhere; as in the Matsya: चिंग्रत्कलार्थव भवेगुहतः। 'A Muhúrta is thirty Kalás. In these divisions of the twenty-four hours, the Kúrma, Márkańdeya, Matsya, Váyu, and Linga Puráńas exactly agree with our authority. In Manu, I., 64, we have the same computation, with a difference in the first article, eighteen Nimeshas being one Káshíhá. The Bhavishya P. follows Manu, in that respect, and agrees, in the rest, with the Padma, which has:

night of mortals: thirty such days make a month, divided into two half-months: six months form an Ayana however, occurs in the Bhágavata* and in the Brahma Vaivarta P. These have:

2 Paramánus = 1 Anu.

3 Anus = 1 Trasarenu.

3 Trasarenus = 1 Trufi.

100 Trufis = 1 Vedha.

3 Vedhas = 1 Lava.

3 Lavas = 1 Nimesha.

3 Nimeshas = 1 Kshańa.

5 Kshanas = 1 Káshthá.

15 Káshíhás = 1 Laghu.

15 Laghus = 1 Nádiká.

2 Nádikás = 1 Muhúrta.

6 or 7 Nádikás = 1 Yama + or watch of the day or night.

Allusions to this, or either of the preceding computations, or to any other, have not been found in either of the other Puránas. Yet the work of Gopála Bhatía, from which Mr. Colebrooke states he derived his information on the subject of Indian weights and measures (A. R., Vol. V., 105), the Sankhyá Parimáńa, cites the Varáha P. for a peculiar computation, and quotes another from the Bhavishya, different from that which occurs in the first chapter of that work, to which we have referred. The principle of the calculation adopted by the astronomical works is different. It is: 6 respirations (Práńa) = 1 Vikalá; 60 Vikalás = 1 Dańda; 60 Dańdas = 1 sidereal day. The Nimesha, which is the base of one of the Pauráńik modes, is a twinkle of the eye of a man at rest; whilst the Paramanu, which is the origin of the other, and, apparently, more modern, system considering the works in which it occurs, is the time taken by a Paramanu, or mote in the sunbeam, to pass through a crevice in a shutter. Some indications of this calculation being in common currency occur in the Hindústání

(the period of the sun's progress north or south of the ecliptic): and two Ayanas compose a year. The southern Ayana is a night, and the northern, a day, of the gods. Twelve thousand divine years, each composed of (three hundred and sixty) such days, * constitute the period of the four Yugas or ages. are thus distributed: the Krita age has four thousand divine years; the Tretá, three thousand; the Dwapara, two thousand; and the Kali age, one thousand: so those acquainted with antiquity have declared. The period that precedes a Yuga is called a Sandhyá; and it is of as many hundred years as there are thousands in the Yuga: and the period that follows a Yuga, termed the Sandhyámsa, is of similar duration. The interval between the Sandhyá and the Sandhyámsa is the Yuga. denominated Krita, Tretá, &c. The Krita, Tretá, Dwápara, and Kali constitute a great age, or aggregate of four ages: a thousand such aggregates are a day of Brahmá; and fourteen Manus reign within that term. terms Renu (Trasareńu) and Lamha† (Laghu) in Indian horometry (A.R., Vol. V., 81); whilst the more ordinary system seems derived from the astronomical works; being 60 Tilas = 1 Vipala; 60 Vipalas = 1 Pala; 60 Palas = 1 Dańda or Ghari. Ibid.

appear, seems to admit of easy explanation. We have, in the first place, a computation of the years of the gods in the four ages, or:

Kŕita	Yuga	. 4000
	Sandhyá
	Sandhyámsa	. 400
	grads and ages	E.71, 19	4800

			1200

If these divine years are converted into years of mortals, by multiplying them by 360 (a year of men being a day of the gods), we obtain the years of which the Yugas of mortals are respectively said to consist:

 $4800 \times 360 = 1.728.000$ $3600 \times 360 = 1.296.000$ $2400 \times 360 = 864.000$ $1200 \times 360 = 432.000$

So that these periods resolve themselves into very simple elements: the notion of four ages in a deteriorating series expressed by descending arithmetical progression, as 4, 3, 2, 1; the conversion of units into thousands; and the mythological fiction, that these were divine years, each composed of 360 years of men. It does not seem necessary to refer the invention to any astronomical computations, or to any attempt to represent actual chronology.

The details of these, as occurring in each Manwantara, are given in the third book, c. 1 and 2.

े चतुर्युगानां संख्याता साधिका ह्येकसप्ततिः।

'One and seventy enumerations of the four ages, with a surplus.' A similar reading occurs in several other Puránas; but none of them state of what the surplus or addition consists. But it is, in fact, the number of years required to reconcile two computations of the Kalpa. The most simple, and, probably, the original, calculation of a Kalpa is its being 1000 great ages, or ages of the gods:

एतद्वादशसाहसं देवानां युगमुखते। दैविकानां युगानां तु सहसं परिसंख्या॥ ब्राह्ममेकमहर्षेयं तावती राचिक्खते।

Bhavishya P. Then 4.320.000 years, or a divine age, × 1000 = 4.320.000.000 years, or a day or night of Brahmá. But a day of Brahmá is also seventy-one times a great age multiplied by fourteen: 4.320.000 × 71 × 14 = 4.294.080.000, or less than the preceding by 25.920.000; and it is to make up for this deficiency, that a certain number of years must be added to the computation by Manwantaras. According to the Súrya Siddhánta, as cited by Mr. Davis (A. R., Vol. II., 231), this addition consists of a Sandhi to each Manwantara, equal to the Satya age, or 1.728.000 years; and one similar Sandhi at the commencement of the Kalpa:* thus, 4.320.000×71=306.720.000+1.728.000=308.448.000×14=4.318.272.000+1.728.000=4.320.000 000. The Pauráńiks, however, omit the

this is the duration of the Manu, the (attendant) divinities, and the rest, which is equal to 852.000 divine years, or to 306.720.000 years of mortals, independent of the additional period. Fourteen times this period constitutes a Bráhma day, that is, a day of Brahmá; the term (Bráhma) being the derivative form. At the end of this day, a dissolution of the universe occurs,* when all the three worlds, earth, and the regions of space are consumed with fire. The dwellers of Maharloka (the region inhabited by the saints who survive the world), distressed by the heat, repair then to Janaloka (the region of holy men after their decease). When the three worlds are but one mighty ocean, Brahmá, who is one with Náráyana, satiate with the demolition of the universe, sleeps upon his serpent-bed-contemplated, the lotos-born, by the ascetic inhabitants of Sandhi of the Kalpa, and add the whole compensation to the Manwantaras. The amount of this, in whole numbers, is 1.851.428 in each Manwantara, or 4.320.000 × 71 = 306.720.000 + 1.851.428 = 308.571.428 × 14 = 4.319.999.992; leaving a very small inferiority to the result of the calculation of a Kalpa by a thousand great ages. To provide for this deficiency, indeed, very minute subdivisions are admitted into the calculation; and the commentator on our text says that the additional years, if of gods, are 5142 years, 10 months, 8 days, 4 watches, 2 Muhúrtas, 8 Kalás, 17 Káshíhás, 2 Nimeshas, and $^{11}_{7}$ th; if of mortals, 1.851.428 years, 6 months, 24 days, 12 Nádís, 12 Kalás, 25 Káshíhas, and 10 Nimeshas. It will be observed that, in the Kalpa, we have the regular descending series 4, 3, 2, with ciphers multiplied ad libitum.

the Janaloka—for a night of equal duration with his day; at the close of which he creates anew. Of such days and nights is a year of Brahmá composed; and a hundred such years constitute his whole life. One Parárdha, or half his existence, has expired, terminating with the Mahá Kalpa called Pádma. The Kalpa

3 In theory, the Kalpas are infinite; as the Bhavishya:

कोटिकोटिसहस्रणि कल्पानां मुनिसत्तमाः। गतानि तावक्छेषाणि॥

'Excellent sages, thousands of millions of Kalpas have passed; and as many are to come.' In the Linga Purána, and others of the Śaiva division, above thirty Kalpas are named, and some account given of several; but they are, evidently, sectarial embellishments. The only Kalpas usually specified are those which follow in the text: the one which was the last, or the Pádma, and the present or Váráha. The first is also commonly called the Bráhma; but the Bhágavata distinguíshes the Bráhma, considering it to be the first of Brahmá's life, whilst the Pádma was the last of the first Parárdha. The term Mahá, or great, Kalpa, applied to the Pádma, is attached to it only in a general sense; or, according to the commentator, because it comprises, as a minor Kalpa, that in which Brahmá was born from a lotos. Properly, a great Kalpa is not a day, but a life, of Brahmá; as in the Brahma Vaivarta:

त्रह्मण्यायुषा कल्यः कालविद्विर्निक्पितः। जुद्रकल्या वज्जतरासे संवतीदयः स्रताः॥

'Chronologers compute a Kalpa by the life of Brahmá. Minor Kalpas, as Samvarta and the rest, are numerous.' Minor Kalpas'

² In the last book, the Parárdha occurs as a very different measure of time; but it is employed here in its ordinary acceptation.*

here denote every period of destruction, or those in which the Samvarta wind, or other destructive agents, operate. Several other computations of time are found in different Puranas; but it will be sufficient to notice one which occurs in the Hari Vamsa; as it is peculiar, and because it is not quite correctly given in M. Langlois's translation. It is the calculation of the Manava time, or time of a Manu:

- 10 divine years = a day and night of a Manu.
- 10 Mánava days = his fortnight.
- 10 Mánava fortnights = his month.
 - 12 Mánava months = his season.
 - 6 Mánava seasons = his year.

Accordingly, the commentator says 72000 divine years make up his year. The French translation has: "Dix années des dieux font un jour de Manou; dix jours des dieux font un Pakcha de Manou", &c. The error lies in the expression "jours des dieux", and is evidently a mere inadvertence; for, if ten years make a day, ten days can scarcely make a fortnight.

CHAPTER IV.

Náráyana's appearance, in the beginning of the Kalpa, as the Varáha or boar: Prithiví (Earth) addresses him: he raises the world from beneath the waters: hymned by Sanandana and the Yogins. The earth floats on the ocean: divided into seven zones. The lower spheres of the universe restored. Creation renewed.

Paráśara.—In what manner the divine Brahmá, who is one with Náráyana, created progeny, and is thence named the lord of progeny (Prajápati), the lord god, you shall hear.†

At the close of the past (or Pádma) Kalpa, the divine Brahmá, endowed with the quality of goodness, awoke from his night of sleep, and beheld the universe void. He, the supreme Náráyańa, the incomprehensible, the sovereign of all creatures, invested with the form of ¹ This creation is of the secondary order, or Pratisarga (प्रतिसर्ग); water, and even the earth, being in existence, and, consequently, having been preceded by the creation of Mahat and the elements. It is also a different Pratisarga from that described by Manu, in which Swayambhu first creates the waters, then the egg: one of the simplest forms, and, perhaps, therefore, one of the earliest, in which the tradition occurs.

He, the lord, † conclu-

¹ This is the well-known verse of Manu, I., 10,‡ rendered, by Sir Wm. Jones: "The waters are called náráh, because they were the production of Nara, or the spirit of god; and, since they were his first ayana, or place of motion, he thence is named Náráyana, or moving on the waters." Now, although there can be little doubt that this tradition is, in substance, the same as that of Genesis, the language of the translation is, perhaps, more scriptural than is quite warranted. The waters, it is said in the text of Manu, were the progeny of Nara, which Kullúka Bhatta explains Paramátman, 'the supreme soul'; that is, they were the first productions of god in creation. Ayana, instead of 'place the synonyms of water in the Nirukta of the Vedas. It may, perhaps, be intended to say, that Náráh or Ápah has the meaning of 'bodily forms', in which spirit is enshrined, and of which the waters, with Vishnu resting upon them, are a type; for there is much mysticism in the Puránas in which the passage thus occurs. Even in them, however, it is introduced in the usual manner, by describing the world as water alone, and Vishnu reposing upon the deep:

The goddess Earth, beholding him thus descending to the subterrene regions, bowed in devout adoration, and thus glorified the god:—

Prithivi (Earth).—Hail to thee, who art all creatures; to thee, the holder of the mace and shell: elevate me now from this place, as thou hast upraised me in days of old. From thee have I proceeded; of thee do I consist; as do the skies and all other existing things. Hail to thee, spirit of the supreme spirit; to thee, soul

As in the Váyu: "The boar was ten Yojanas in breadth, a thousand Yojanas high; of the colour of a dark cloud; and his roar was like thunder; his bulk was vast as a mountain; his tusks were white, sharp, and fearful; fire flashed from his eyes like lightning, and he was radiant as the sun; his shoulders were round, fat, and large; he strode along like a powerful lion; his haunches were fat, his loins were slender, and his body was smooth and beautiful." * Matsya P. describes the Varáha in the same words, with one or two unimportant varieties. The Bhágavata + indulges in that amplification which marks its more recent composition, and describes the Varáha as issuing from the nostrils of Brahmá, at first of the size of the thumb, or an inch long, and presently increasing to the stature of an elephant. That work also subjoins a legend of the death of the demon Hiranyaksha, t who, in a preceding existence, was one of Vishnu's doorkeepers, at his palace in Vaikuńtha. Having refused admission to a party of Munis, they cursed him; and he was, in consequence, born as one of the sons of Diti. When the earth, oppressed by the weight of the mountains, sank down into the waters, Vishnu was beheld in the subterrene regions, or Rasátala, by Hiranyáksha, in the. act of carrying it off. The demon claimed the earth, and defied Vishnu to combat; and a conflict took place, in which Hiranyaksha was slain. This legend has not been met with in any other Purána, and certainly does not occur in the chief of them, any more than in our text. In the Moksha Dharma of the Mahábhárata, c. 35, Vishnu destroys the demons, in the form of the Varáha; but no particular individual is specified; nor does the elevation of the earth depend upon their discomfiture. The Káliká Upapurana has an absurd legend of a conflict between Siva as a

and the Munis sought for shelter amongst the bristles upon the scriptural body of the boar, trembling as he rose up, supporting the earth, and dripping with moisture. Then the great sages, Sanandana and the rest, residing continually in the sphere of saints, were inspired with delight; and, bowing lowly, they praised the stern-eyed upholder of the earth.*

The Yogins.—Triumph, lord of lords supreme; Keśava, sovereign of the earth, the wielder of the mace, the shell, the discus, and the sword: cause of production, destruction, and existence. Thou ART, O god: there is no other supreme condition but thou. Thou, lord, art the person of sacrifice: for thy feet are the Vedas; thy tusks are the stake to which the victim is bound; in thy teeth are the offerings; thy mouth is the altar; thy tongue is the fire; and the hairs of thy body are the sacrificial grass. Thine eyes, O omnipotent, are day and night; thy head is the seat of all, the place of Brahma; thy mane is all the hymns of the Vedas; thy nostrils are all oblations: O thou, whose snout is the ladle of oblation; whose deep voice is the chanting of the Sáma Veda; whose body is the hall of sacrifice; whose joints are the different ceremonies; and whose ears have the properties of both voluntary and obligatory rites:1 do thou, who art eternal, who art in size a mountain,* be propitious. We acknowledge thee, who hast traversed the world, O universal form, to be the beginning, the continuance, and the destruction of all things: thou art the supreme god. Have pity on us, O lord of conscious and unconscious beings. The orb of the earth is seen seated on the tip of thy tusks, as if thou hadst been sporting amidst a lake where the lotos floats, and hadst borne away the leaves covered with soil. The space between heaven and earth is occupied by thy body, O thou of unequalled glory, resplendent with the power of pervading the universe, O lord, for the benefit of all. Thou art the aim of all: there is none other than thee, sovereign of the world: this is thy might, by which all things, fixed or movable, are pervaded. This form, which is now beheld, is thy form, as one essentially with wisdom. Those who have not practised devotion conceive erroneously of the nature of the world. The ignorant, who do not perceive that this universe is of the nature of wisdom, and judge of it as an object of perception only, are lost in the ocean of spiritual ignorance. But they who know true wisdom, and whose minds are pure, behold this whole world as one with divine knowledge, as one with thee, O god. Be favourable, O universal spirit: raise up this earth, for the habitation of created beings. Inscrutable deity, whose eyes are like lotoses, give us felicity. O lord, thou art endowed with the quality of goodness:

raise up, Govinda, this earth, for the general good. Grant us happiness, O lotos-eyed. May this, thy activity in creation, be beneficial to the earth. Salutation to thee. Grant us happiness, O lotos-eyed.

PARÁŚARA.—The supreme being thus eulogized, upholding the earth, raised it quickly, and placed it on the summit of the ocean, where it floats like a mighty vessel, and, from its expansive surface, does not sink beneath the waters.* Then, having levelled the earth, the great eternal deity divided it into portions, by mountains. He who never wills in vain created, by his irresistible power, those mountains again upon the earth, which had been consumed at the destruction of the world. Having then divided the earth into seven great portions or continents, as it was before, he constructed, in like manner, the four (lower) spheres, earth, sky, heaven, and the sphere of the sages (Maharloka). Thus Hari, the four-faced god, invested with the quality of activity, and taking the form of Brahmá, accomplished the creation. But he (Brahmá) is only the instrumental cause of things to be created; the things that are capable of being created arise from nature as a common material cause. With exception of one instrumental cause alone, there is no need of any other cause; for (imperceptible) substance becomes perceptible substance according to the powers with which it is originally imbued. 14

nature; "all parts of matter being supposed able to form themselves artificially and methodically  to the greatest advantage of their present respective capabilities." This, which Cudworth (c. III.) calls hylozoism, is not incompatible with an active creator: "not  that he should αὐτουργεῖν άπαντα, set his own hand  to every work," which, as Aristotle says, would be, ἀπρεπές  τῷ Θεῷ, unbecoming God; but, as in the case of Brahmá and other subordinate agents, that they should occasion the various developments of crude nature to take place, by supplying that will, of which nature itself is incapable. Action being once instituted by an instrumental medium, or by the will of an intellectual agent, it is continued by powers, or a vitality inherent in nature or the matter of creation itself. The efficiency of such subordinate causes was advocated by Plato, Aristotle, and others; and the opinion of Zeno, as stated by Laërtius, might be taken for a translation of some such passage as that in our text: "Έστι δὲ φύσις έξις ἐξ αὐτῆς κινουμένη κατά σπερματικούς λόγους, αποτελοῦσά τε καὶ συνέχουσα τὰ ἐξ αὐτῆς ἐν ώρισμένοις χρόνοις, καὶ τοιαῦτα δρῶσα ἀφ' οίων ἀπεκρίθη. Nature is a habit moved from itself, according to  seminal principles; perfecting and containing those several things which in determinate times are produced from it, and acting agreeably to that from which it was secreted." Intell. System, I., 328. So the commentator illustrates our text, by observing that the cause of the budding of rice is in its own seed, and its development is from itself, though its growth takes place only

These rather obscure verses lend themselves, without violence, to some such interpretation as the following: "He is only the ideal cause of the potencies to be created in the work of creation; and from him proceed the potencies to be created, after they have become the real cause. Save that one ideal cause, there is no other to which the world can be referred. Worthiest of ascetics, through its potency—i. e., through the potency of that cause—every created thing comes by its proper nature."

In the Vedanta and Nyaya, nimitta is the efficient cause, as contrasted with upádána, the material cause. In the Sankhya, pradhána implies the functions of both. The author, it appears, means to express, in the passage before us, that Brahmá is a cause superior to pradhána. This cause he calls nimitta. It was necessary, therefore, in the translation, to choose terms neither Vedánta nor Sánkhya. "Ideal cause" and "real cause" may, perhaps, answer the purpose.

CHAPTER V.

Vishńu as Brahmá creates the world. General characteristics of creation. Brahmá meditates, and gives origin to, immovable things, animals, gods, men. Specific creation of nine kinds: Mahat, Tanmátra, Aindriya, inanimate objects, animals, gods, men, Anugraha, and Kaumára. More particular account of creation. Origin of different orders of beings from Brahmá's body under different conditions; and of the Vedas from his mouths. All things created again as they existed in a former Kalpa.

MAITREYA.—Now unfold to me, Brahman, how this deity created the gods, sages, progenitors, demons, men, animals, trees, and the rest, that abide on earth, in heaven, or in the waters; how Brahmá, at creation, made the world, with the qualities, the characteristics, and the forms of things.¹

Paráśara.—I will explain to you, Maitreya: listen attentively, how this deity, the lord of all, created the gods and other beings.

^{*} See Professor Wilson's note in p. 34, supra, and the appended comment.

Whilst he (Brahmá) formerly, in the beginning of the Kalpas,* was meditating on creation, there appeared a creation beginning with ignorance, and consisting of darkness. From that great being appeared fivefold Ignorance, consisting of obscurity, illusion, extreme illusion, gloom, utter darkness.¹ The creation of the creator thus plunged in abstraction was the fivefold (immovable) world, without intellect or reflection, void of perception or sensation, incapable of feeling, and ¹ Or Tamas (तसस्), Moha (मोह), Mahámoha (महामोह), Támisra (तासिस्), Andhatámisra (अन्धतासिस्); they are the five kinds of obstruction, Viparyaya (विपर्यय), of soul's liberation. According to the Sánkhya, they are explained to be: 1. The belief of material substance being the same with spirit; 2. Notion of property or possession, and consequent attachment to objects. as children and the like, as being one's own; 3. Addiction to the enjoyments of sense; 4. Impatience or wrath; and 5. Fear of privation or death. They are called, in the Pátanjala philosophy, the five afflictions, Klesa (), but are similarly explained by Avidyá (স্বিরা), 'ignorance'; Asmitá (স্থানা), 'selfishness', literally 'I-amness'; Rága (राग), 'love'; Dwesha (देष), 'hatred'; and Abhinivesa (অমিলিবিয়া), 'dread of temporal suffering'. Sánkhya Káriká, pp. 148-150. This creation by Brahmá in the Váráha Kalpa begins in the same way, and in the same words, in most of the Puránas. The Bhágavata; reverses the order of these five products, and gives them, Andhatámisra, Támisra, Mahámoha, Moha, and Tamas; a variation obviously more immethodical than the usual reading of the text, and adopted, no doubt, t merely for the sake of giving the passage an air of originality.

destitute of motion. 1* Since immovable things were first created, this is called the first creation. † Brahmá,

Another reading of the second line gives वहिर्नः प्रकाश्य । अप्र-तिवीधवान being taken in connexion with वहिस्, the meaning is, then: "devoid of reflection on external objects, endowed with inward manifestations." This is according to the commentary, which interprets the "inward manifestations" as being cognitions chiefly of a sensual kind.

The word 3, as used in the stanza quoted, is very unusual.

† मुख्या नगा यतश्चीता मुख्यसर्गस्तस्त्वयम्।

The commentator refers to a sacred text for the explanation that immovable things are technically styled "primary", mukhya, on the ground that they were produced at the beginning of the creation of the gods and others: मुखे देवादिसगादी जातलातुखाः प्रोता निगमनित sations, and associating with each other (according to their kinds).*

Beholding this creation also imperfect, Brahmá again meditated; and a third creation appeared, abounding with the quality of goodness, termed Úrdhwasrotas. The beings thus produced in the Úrdhwasrotas creation were endowed with pleasure and enjoyment, unencumbered internally or externally, and luminous within and without. This, termed the creation of immortals,:

horse, the mule, the ass, the yak, the Śarabha, and the Gaura or white deer. The second are the cow, the goat, the buffalo, the hog, the gayal, the black deer, the antelope, the camel, and the sheep. § "Black deer" is krishna; "antelope", ruru; "lizard", godha; and "alligator", makara.

The gods are called irdhwasrotas, because they obtain their food extraneously to the body. That is to say, the bare sight of aliment stands, to them, in place of eating it: "for there is satisfaction from the mere beholding of ambrosia". So says—not a Vaidik text, but—the

was the third performance of Brahmá, who, although well pleased with it, still found it incompetent to fulfil his end.* Continuing, therefore, his meditations, there sprang, in consequence of his infallible purpose,† the creation termed Arváksrotas, from indiscrete nature. The products of this are termed Arváksrotas,¹ from the downward current (of their nutriment). They abound with the light of knowledge; but the qualities of darkness and of foulness predominate. Hence they are afflicted by evil, and are repeatedly impelled to action. They have knowledge both externally and internally, and are the instruments (of accomplishing the object of creation, the liberation of soul).‡ These creatures were mankind.§

I have thus explained to you, excellent Muni, six²

commentator. The quotation from the Veda, which he adds, in support of his view, is: न ह वे देवा अश्वान्ति नापि पिवन्ति। एतदेवामृतं हृद्दा तृष्यन्ति। "The gods do not, indeed, either eat or drink. Having looked upon this ambrosia, they are satisfied."

* The translation is here somewhat compressed.

† Satyábhidháyin, - here an epithet of Brahmá, - "true to his will".

The commentator explains it by satya-sankalpa.

‡ The words in brackets are supplied by the translator. The commentator says: साधना: नर्मजानाधिनादिवात | Allusion is made, in the original text, to man's exclusive prerogative to engage in sacrifice and to explore the nature of spirit. See the editor's first note in p. 71, supra.

§ For another rendering, see Original Sanskrit Texts, Part I., pp. 20

Men are called arváksrotas, because they are developed by means of their food going downwards. So says the commentator: यसाद्वीगधः प्रविष्टेनाहारेण व्यन्तेत तसात्ते साधनसर्गा जाताः। Possibly the right word is aváksrotas.

creations. The first creation was that of Mahat or Intellect, which is also called the creation of Brahmá. The second was that of the rudimental principles (Tanmátras), thence termed the elemental creation (Bhútasarga). The third was the modified form of egotism, termed the organic creation, or creation of the senses (Aindriyaka). These three were the Prákrita creations, the developments of indiscrete nature, preceded by the indiscrete principle. The fourth or fundamental creations described; for, as presently enumerated, the stages of creation are seven. The commentator, however, considers the Úrdhwasrotas creation, or that of the superhuman beings, to be the same with that of the Indriyas or senses, over which they preside; by which the number is reduced to six.†

² The text is: सर्ग: संभूतो वृद्धिपूर्वक:। which is, as rendered in the text, 'creation preceded by, or beginning with, Buddhi, in-

^{* &}quot;Modified form of egotism" here translates vaikárika; and this is synonymous with sáttwika, the adjective of sattwa. See Professor Wilson's note in p. 34, and the editor's comment in p. 35, supra.

[†] Mention has been made, in the second chapter, of three creations, denominated mahattattwa, bhúta, and indriya; and we have just read of four, the mukhya, tiryaksrotas, úrdhwasrotas, and arváksrotas. The indriya comprehends the úrdhwasrotas, according to the commentator. He speaks of a reading "seven", instead of "six"; when, he says, the úrdhwasrotas is not comprised in the indriya; and the order of the creations is as follows: mahattattwa, bhúta, indriya, mukhya, tiryaksrotas, úrdhwasrotas, and arváksrotas.

[:] Most of my copies of the commentary have: यदा ब्रह्मा परमाता तसान्यहतः सर्ग द्वार्थः।

tion (of perceptible things) was that of inanimate bodies.* The fifth, the Tairyagyonya creation, was that of animals. The sixth was the Urdhwasrotas creation, or that of the divinities. The creation of the Arváksrotas beings was the seventh, and was that of man. There is an eighth creation, termed Anugraha, which possesses both the qualities of goodness and telligence.' The rules of euphony would, however, admit of a mute negative being inserted, or संभूतो ऽनुश्चिपूर्वकः । 'preceded by ignorance'; that is, by the chief principle, crude nature or Pradhána, which is one with ignorance: but this seems to depend on notions of a later date and more partial adoption than those generally prevailing in our authority; and the first reading, therefore, has been preferred. It is also to be observed, that the first unintellectual creation was that of immovable objects (as in p. 69, supra), the original of which is

and all ambiguity of construction is avoided. The reading is also established by the text of the Linga Purána, which enumerates the different series of creation in the words of the Vishnu, except in this passage, which is there transposed, with a slight variation of the reading. Instead of प्रथमी महतः संगी विज्ञेयी ब्रह्मण्सु सः।†

it is

प्रथमो महतः सर्गः संभूतौ बुद्धिपूर्वकः।

'The first creation was that of Mahat; Intellect being the first in manifestation.' The reading of the Váyu P. is still more tautological, but confirms that here preferred:

प्रथमो महतः सगी विच्चेयो महतस्तु सः। darkness.¹ Of these creations five are secondary and three are primary.² But there is a ninth, the Kaumára

पञ्चमो ऽनुग्रहः सर्गः स चतुर्धा व्यवस्थितः। विपर्ययेगाभूत्वा च सिद्धा तुष्या तथैव च ॥

'The fifth is the Anugraha creation, which is subdivided into four kinds; by obstruction, disability, perfectness, and acquiescence.' This is the Pratyayasarga or intellectual creation of the Sánkhyas (S. Káriká, v. 46, p. 146); the creation of which we have a notion, or to which we give assent (Anugraha), in contradistinction to organic creation, or that existence of which we have sensible perception. In its specific subdivisions, it is the notion of certain inseparable properties in the four different orders of beings: obstruction or stolidity in inanimate things; inability or imperfection in animals; perfectibility in man; and acquiescence or tranquil enjoyment in gods. So also the Váyu P.:

खावरेषु विपर्यासिखर्यग्योनिष्वम्तिता। सिखातानो मनुष्यासु तृष्टिर्देवेषु क्रत्नमः॥

² Or Vaikrita, derived mediately from the first principle, through its Vikritis, 'productions' or 'developments'; and Prákrita, derived more immediately from the chief principle itself. Mahat and the two forms of Ahańkára, or the rudimental elements and the senses, constitute the latter class; inanimate beings, &c. compose the former: or the latter are considered as the work of Brahmá, whilst the three first are evolved from Pradhána. So the Váyu:

[‡] The Váyu-purána, to the same effect—only that it substitutes "eighth" for "fifth"—as the verses given above, is cited by the commentator. Then follows the stanza with which the note concludes.

creation, which is both primary and secondary. These are the nine creations of the great progenitor of all,

प्राक्ततासु चयः सगीः कतास्ते बुह्मपूर्वकाः। बुह्मिपूर्वे प्रवर्तने षद्धगा ब्रह्मणस्तु ते॥

'The three creations beginning with Intelligence are elemental; but the six creations which proceed from the series of which Intellect is the first are the work of Brahmá.'

¹ We must have recourse, here also, to other Puránas, for the elucidation of this term. The Kaumára creation is the creation of Rudra or Nílalohita, a form of Šiva, by Brahmá, which is subsequently described in our text, and of certain other mind-born sons of Brahmá, of whose birth the Vishnu P. gives no further account. They are elsewhere termed Sanatkumára, Sananda, Sanaka, and Sanátana, with sometimes a fifth, Řibhu, added. These, declining to create progeny, remained, as the name of the first implies, ever boys, Kumáras; that is, ever pure and innocent; whence their creation is called the Kaumára. Thus the Váyu:

चये ससर्ज वे ब्रह्मा मानसानातानः समान् । । सनन्दनं ससनकं विद्वांसं च सनातनस् ॥ सनन्तुमारमेव च न ते लोके तु सर्जन्ते। निर्पेचाः सनातनाः * * * ॥

And the Linga has:

यथोत्पन्नः सदा एव कुमारः स इहोच्यते। तस्मात्मनत्कुमारिति नामास्तीह प्रकीर्तितः॥*

'Being ever as he was born, he is here called a youth; and hence his name is well known as Sanatkumára.' This authority makes Sanatkumára and Řibhu the two first born of all:

> च्युः सनत्तुमार्च दावेतावूर्धरेतसी। पूर्वोत्पन्नौ पुरा तेभ्यः सर्वेषामपि पूर्वजी॥†

whilst the text of the Hari Vamsa limits the primogeniture to Sanatkumara:

सनलुमारं च विभुं पूर्वेषामि पूर्वजम् । In another place, however, it enumerates, apparently, six, or the and, both as primary and secondary, are the radical causes of the world, proceeding from the sovereign creator. What else dost thou desire to hear?

above four, with Sana, and either Ribhu or another Sanátana: for the passage is corrupt. The French translation ascribes a share in creation to Sanatkumára: Les sept Pradjâpatis, Roudra, Scanda (son fils), et Sanatcoumâra se mirent à produire les êtres, répandant partout l'inépuisable énergie du Dieu. The original is:

सप्तिते जनयन्ति सा प्रजा रहस भारत। स्तन्दः सनलुमारस तेजः संचिष्य तिष्ठतः॥†

Sankshipya is not 'répandant', but 'restraining'; and Tishthatah, being in the dual number, relates, of course, to only two of the series. The correct rendering is: 'These seven (Prajápatis) created progeny; and so did Rudra: but Skanda and Sanatkumára, restraining their power, abstained (from creation).' So the commentator: सृष्टिसामर्थ्य संचिष्य निगृह्य सृष्टिमकुर्वन्तावेव तिष्ठत: । These sages, however, live as long as Brahmá; and they are only created by him in the first Kalpa, although their generation is very commonly, but inconsistently, introduced in the Váráha or Pádma Kalpa. This creation, says the text, is both primary (Prákŕita) and secondary (Vaikŕita). It is the latter, according to the commentator, as regards the origin of these saints from Brahmá: it is the former, as affects Rudra, who, though proceeding from Brahmá, in a certain form was in essence equally an immediate production of the first principle. These notions, the birth of Rudra and the saints, seem to have been borrowed from the Saivas, and to have been awkwardly engrafted upon the Vaishnava system. Sanatkumára and his brethren; are always described, in the Saiva Puránas, as Yogins: as the Kúrma, after enumerating them, adds:

पचैते योगिनो विद्याः परं विराग्यमात्रिताः।

MAITREYA.—Thou hast briefly related to me, Muni, the creation of the gods and other beings. I am desirous, chief of sages, to hear from thee a more ample account of their creation.

Paráśara.—Created beings, although they are destroyed (in their individual forms) at the periods of dissolution, yet, being affected by the good or evil acts of former existence, they are never exempted from their consequences; and, when Brahmá creates the world anew, they are the progeny of his will, in the fourfold condition of gods, men, animals, or inanimate things. Brahmá then, being desirous of creating the four orders of beings, termed gods, demons, progeni-

'These five, O Brahmans, were Yogins, who acquired entire exemption from passion:' and the Hari Vańśa, although rather Vaishńava than Śaiva, observes, that the Yogins celebrate these six, along with Kapila, in Yoga works:

त्रह्माणं कपिनं चैव पंडेतान्त्रह्मयोगिनः। यतयो योगतन्त्रेषु यान्सुवन्ति द्विजातयः॥

The idea seems to have been amplified also in the Śaiva works; for the Linga P. describes the repeated birth of Śiva, or Vámadeva, as a Kumára, or boy, from Brahmá, in each Kalpa, who again becomes four. Thus, in the twenty-ninth Kalpa, Śwetalohita is the Kumára; and he becomes Sananda, Nandana, Viśwananda, Upanandana; all of a white complexion: in the thirtieth, the Kumára becomes Virajas, Viváhu, Višoka, Viśwabhávana; all of a red colour: in the thirty-first, he becomes four youths of a yellow colour; and, in the thirty-second, the four Kumáras were black. All these are, no doubt, comparatively recent additions to the original notion of the birth of Rudra and the Kumáras; itself obviously a sectarial innovation upon the primitive doctrine of the birth of the Prajápatis or will-born sons of Brahmá.

tors, and men, collected his mind into itself.¹ Whilst thus concentrated, the quality of darkness pervaded his body; and thence the demons (the Asuras) were first born, issuing from his thigh. Brahmá then abandoned that form which was composed of the rudiment of darkness, and which, being deserted by him, became night. Continuing to create, but assuming a different shape, he experienced pleasure; and thence from his mouth proceeded the gods, endowed with the quality of goodness. The form abandoned by him became day, in which the good quality predominates; and hence by day the gods are most powerful, and by night the demons. He next adopted another person, in which the rudiment of goodness also prevailed; and, thinking of himself as the father of the world, the progenitors (the

'Collecting his mind into itself', मनी समाधता। according to the comment, is the performance of the Yoga (Yúyuje). The term Ambhámsi, lit., 'waters', for the four orders of beings, gods, demons, men, and Pitris, is, also, a peculiar, and, probably, mystic, term. The commentator says it occurs in the Vedas, as a synonym of gods, &c.: एनानि चलायशांसि। देना मनुषा: पिनरो ६स्रा इति युते:. The Váyu Purána derives it from भा to shine'; because the different orders of beings shine, or flourish, severally, by moonlight, night, day, and twilight: भानित यसातताऽसांसि। &c.

These reiterated, and not always very congruous, accounts of the creation are explained, by the Puránas, as referring to different Kalpas or renovations of the world, and therefore involving no incompatibility. A better reason for their appearance is, the probability that they have been borrowed from different original authorities. The account that follows is evidently modified by the Yogi Śaivas, by its general mysticism, and by the expressions with which it begins:

BOOK I., CHAP. V.

Pitris) were born from his side.* The body, when he abandoned it, became the Sandhyá (or evening twilight), the interval between day and night. Brahmá then assumed another person, pervaded by the quality of foulness; and from this, men, in whom foulness (or passion) predominates, were produced. Quickly abandoning that body, it became morning twilight, or the dawn. At the appearance of this light of day, men feel most vigour; while the progenitors are most powerful in the evening season. In this manner, Maitreya, Jyotsná (dawn), Rátri (night), Ahan (day), and Sandhyá (evening), are the four bodies of Brahmá invested by the three qualities. ¹

तां क्रणचरणाक्षोजां मदिवह्रवकोचनाम् । काचीकवापविवसद्दुकूनाच्द्रमरोधसम् ॥ अन्योन्याक्षिषयोनुङ्गविरकारपयोधराम् । सुनासां सुद्दिजां क्रिय्धहासकीवावकोकनाम् ॥ गृहकों त्रीडयासानं नीकावकवद्द्रिणीम् ।

¹ This account is given in several other Puránas: in the Kúrma, with more simplicity; in the Padma, Linga, and Váyu, with more detail. The Bhágavata, as usual, amplifies still more copiously, and mixes up much absurdity with the account. Thus, the person of Sandhyá, 'evening twilight', is thus described: "She appeared with eyes rolling with passion, whilst her lotos-like feet sounded with tinkling ornaments: a muslin vest depended from her waist, secured by a golden zone: her breasts were protuberant and close together; her nose was elegant; her teeth, beautiful; her face was bright with smiles, and she modestly concealed it with the skirts of her robe; whilst the dark curls clustered round her brow." † The Asuras address her, and win her to become their

Next, from Brahmá, in a form composed of the quality of foulness, was produced hunger, of whom anger was born: and the god put forth, in darkness, beings emaciate with hunger, of hideous aspects, and with long beards. Those beings hastened to the deity. Such of them as exclaimed Oh preserve us! were, thence, called Rákshasas: 1* others, who cried out Let us eat, bride. To the four forms of our text the same work adds: Tandri, 'sloth'; Jrimbhańa, 'yawning'; Nidrá, 'sleep'; Unmáda, 'insanity'; Antardhána, 'disappearance'; Pratibimba, † 'reflexion'; which become the property of Pisáchas, Kimnaras, Bhútas, Gandharvas, Vidyádharas, Sádhyas, Pitris, and Manus. The notions of night, day, twilight, and moonlight being derived from Brahmá seem to have originated with the Vedas. Thus, the commentator on the Bhágavata observes: यास तन्तामगहत सा वासि-सामविति युति: I 'That which was his body, and was left, was darkness: this is the Śruti.' All the authorities place night before day, and the Asuras or Titans, before the gods, in the order of appearance; as did Hesiod and other ancient theogonists.

were named Rakshasas."

It is related, in the Bhágavata-puráňa, III., 20, 19-21, that Brahmá transformed himself into night, invested with a body. This the Yakshas and Rákshasas seized upon, exclaiming "Do not spare it; devour it." Brahmá cried out "Don't devour me; spare me."

The original of Brahma's petition is: मा मां जचत रचत।

were denominated, from that expression, Yakshas.¹ Beholding them so disgusting, the hairs of Brahmá* were shrivelled up, and, first falling from his head, were again renewed upon it. From their falling, they became serpents, called Sarpa, from their creeping, and Ahi, because they had deserted the head.² The creator of the world, being incensed, then created fierce beings, who were denominated goblins, Bhútas (malignant fiends), and eaters of flesh.† The Gandharvas were next born, imbibing melody. Drinking of the goddess of speech, they were born, and thence their appellation.³

The divine Brahmá, influenced by their material energies, having created these beings, made others of his own will. animals, from his feet; whilst from the hairs of his body sprang herbs, roots, and fruits.

Brahmá, having created, in the commencement of the Kalpa, various* plants, employed them in sacrifices, in the beginning of the Tretá age. Animals were distinguished into two classes, domestic (village) and wild (forest). The first class contained the cow, the goat, the hog,† the sheep, the horse, the ass, the mule; the latter, all beasts of prey,‡ and many animals with cloven hoofs, the elephant, and the monkey. The fifth order were the birds; the sixth, aquatic animals; and the seventh, reptiles and insects.¹§

From his eastern mouth Brahmá then created the Gáyatra metre, the Řig-veda, the collection of hymns termed Trivřit, the Rathantara portion of the Sámaveda, and the Agnishtoma sacrifice: from his southern mouth he created the Yajur-veda, the Traishtubha metre, the collection of hymns called Panchadaśa, the Brihat Sáman, and the portion of the Sáma-veda termed Ukthya: from his western mouth he created

¹ This and the preceding enumeration of the origin of vegetables and animals occurs in several Puránas, precisely in the same words. The Linga adds a specification of the Áranya or wild animals, which are said to be the buffalo, gayal, bear, monkey, Śarabha, wolf, and lion.

^{*} Insert "sacrificial animals", paśu.

[†] The MSS. consulted by me have "man" purusha. The commentator observes, that, in the nara-medha, or human sacrifice, man is accounted a sacrificial animal. His words are: पुरुषो मनुष्य:। नर्मधे तस्य पशुन्तकस्पनात ।

the Sáma-veda, the Jagatí metre, the collection of hymns termed Saptadaśa, the portion of the Sáman called Vairúpa, and the Atirátra sacrifice: and from his northern mouth he created the Ekavinśa collection of hymns, the Atharva-veda, the Áptoryáman rite, the Anushtubh metre, and the Vairája portion of the Sáma-veda. **

This specification of the parts of the Vedas that proceed from Brahmá occurs, in the same words, in the Váyu, Linga, Kúrma, Padma, and Márkańdeya Puráńas. The Bhágavata offers some important varieties: "From his eastern and other mouths he created the Rich, Yajus, Sáman, and Atharva Vedas; the Sastra (श्रुक्त) or 'the unuttered incantation'; Ijyá (उच्चा), 'oblation'; Stuti (ख्रुक्त) and Stoma (खाम), 'prayers' and 'hymns'; and Práyaśchitta (प्रायस्ति), 'expiation', or 'sacred philosophy' (Bráhma): also the Vedas of medicine, arms, music, and mechanics; and the Itihásas and Puráńas, which are a fifth Veda: also the portions of the Vedas called Shodaśin, Ukthya, Puríshin, Agnishíut, Áptoryáman, Atirátra, Vájapeya, Gosava;† the four Professor Wilson's "Gáyatri", "Trishfubh", and "Uktha" have been corrected to Gáyatra, Traishfubha, and Ukthya.

See, regarding the passage thus annotated, Original Sanskrit Texts, Part III., pp. 6 and 7.

† These are not characterized, in the original, as "portions of the Vedas". They are sacrificial proceedings.

^{*} It is on the authority of the commentator, as supplementing the text, that Gáyatra and Anushfubh are here said to be metres; that Agnishfoma, Atirátra, and Áptoryáman are taken to denote parts of a sacrifice, viz., of the Jyotishfoma; and that Vairúpa and Vairája denominate sundry verses of the Sáma-veda. But the commentator also says that Ukthya is, here, a stage of a sacrifice: सोमसंख्यान. He means the Jyotishfoma.

As to Áptoryáman, both in the Vishúu-puráúa and in the Bhágavata, it is to be regarded as a Pauráúik alteration of the Vaidik Aptoryáma.

In this manner, all creatures, great or small, proceeded from his limbs. The great progenitor of the parts of virtue, purity, liberality, piety, and truth; the orders of life, and their institutes and different religious rites and professions; and the sciences of logic, ethics, and polity. The mystic words and monosyllable proceeded from his heart; the metre Ushńih, from the hairs of his body; Gáyatrí, from his skin; Trishíubh, from his flesh; Anushíubh, from his tendons; Jagatí, from his bones; Pankti, from his marrow; Břihatí, from his breath. The consonants were his life; the vowels, his body; the sibilants, his senses; the semi-vowels, his vigour."* This mysticism, although, perhaps, expanded and amplified by the Pauráńiks, appears to originate with the Vedas; as in the text agguarded of the Vedas specified in the text are yet, for the most part, uninvestigated.

CHAPTER VI.

Origin of the four castes: their primitive state. Progress of society. Different kinds of grain. Efficacy of sacrifice. Duties of men: regions assigned them after death.

MAITREYA. - Thou hast briefly noticed, illustrious sage, the creation termed Arváksrotas, or that of mankind. Now explain to me more fully how Brahmá accomplished it; how he created the four different castes; " what duties he assigned to the Brahmans and the rest. 1

Parásara. - Formerly, O best of Brahmans, when the truth-meditating † Brahmá was desirous of creating the world, there sprang, from his mouth, beings especially endowed with the quality of goodness; others, from his breast, pervaded by the quality of foulness; others, from his thighs, in whom foulness and darkness prevailed; and others, from his feet, in whom the quality of darkness predominated. These were, in succession, beings of the several castes, -Brahmans, Kshatrivas, Vaisyas, and Śúdras; produced from the mouth,

^{*} Add "and with what qualities": यजुणांच ! † Satyabhidhayin, "true to his will." The commentator here, for the second time, explains it by satya-sankalpa. See my second note in p. 73, supra.

the breast, the thighs, and the feet, of Brahmá. 1 These he created for the performance of sacrifices; the four castes being the fit instruments of their celebration." By sacrifices, O thou who knowest the truth, the gods are nourished; and, by the rain which they bestow, mankind are supported:2 and thus sacrifices, the source of happiness, are performed by pious men, attached to their duties, attentive to prescribed obligations, and walking in the paths of virtue. Men acquire (by them) heavenly fruition, or final felicity: they go, after death, to whatever sphere they aspire to, as the consequence of their human nature. The beings who were created by Brahmá, of these four castes, were, at first, endowed with righteousness and perfect faith; they abode wherever they pleased, unchecked by any impediment; their hearts were free from guile; they were pure, made free from soil, by observance of sacred institutes. In their sanctified minds Hari dwelt; and they were filled with perfect wisdom, by which they contemplated the glory of Vishńu.¹ After a while, (after the Tretá age had continued for some period), that portion of Hari which has been described as one with Kála (time) infused into created beings sin, as yet feeble, though formidable, or passion and the like—the impediment of soul's liberation, the seed of iniquity, sprung from darkness and desire. The innate perfectness of human nature was then no more evolved: the eight kinds of perfection, Rasollásá and the rest, were impaired;² and, these

² According to Manu, oblations ascend to and nourish the sun; whence the rain falls upon earth, and causes the growth of corn. ‡ Burnt-offerings are, therefore, the final causes of the support of mankind.

² These eight perfections or Siddhis are not the supernatural faculties obtained by the performance of the Yoga. They are described, the commentator says, in the Skanda and other works; and from them he extracts their description: 1. Rasollásá, the spontaneous or prompt evolution of the juices of the body, independently of nutriment from without: 2. Třipti, mental satisfaction, or freedom from sensual desire: 3. Sámya, sameness of degree: 4. Tulyatá, similarity of life, form, and feature: 5. Višoká, exemption alike from infirmity or grief: 6. Consummation of penance and meditation, by attainment of true knowledge: 7. The power of going everywhere at will: 8. The faculty of reposing at any time or in any place.* These attributes are alluded to, being enfeebled, and sin gaining strength, mortals were afflicted with pain, arising from susceptibility to contrasts, (as heat and cold, and the like).* They therefore constructed places of refuge, protected by trees, by mountains, or by water; surrounded them by a ditch or a wall, and formed villages and cities; and in them erected appropriate dwellings, as defences against the sun and the cold.¹ Having thus provided security

The measurement of the Brahmáúda is less detailed. A span from the thumb to the first finger is a Pradeśa; to the middle finger, a Tála; * to the third finger, a Gokarúa; and, to the little finger, a Vitasti, which is equal to twelve Angulas or fingers; understanding, thereby, according to the Váyu, a joint of the finger () According to other authorities, it is the breadth of the thumb at the tip.

For this passage, I have used manuscripts, in preference to the Calcutta edition of the Márkaúdeya-puráňa. According to my text, the measures noted are as follows:

A paramánu is a para súkshma, ultimate minimum; or the sense may be

8 paramánu = 1 para súkshma, 8 para súkshma = 1 trasarenu. 8 trasarenu = 1 mahirajas. 8 mahirajas = 1 bálágra. 8 bálágra = 1 likshá, 8 likshá = 1 yúká.

(A. R., Vol. V., 104.) The Váyu, giving similar measurements, † upon the authority of Manu t (सनीर्धानि प्रसाणानि), although such a statement does not occur in the Manu Samhita, adds, that 21 fingers=1 Ratni; 24 fingers=1 Hasta or cubit; 2 Ratnis=1 Kishku; 4 Hastas = 1 Dhanus; 2000 Dhanusas = 1 Gavyúti; and 8000 Dhanusas = 1 Yojana. Durgas or stronghold are of four kinds; three of which are natural, from their situation in mountains, amidst water, or in other inaccessible spots. The fourth is the artificial defences of a village (Gráma), a hamlet (Khetaka), or a city (Pura or Nagara), which are, severally, half the size of the next in the series. The best kind of city is one which is about a mile long by half a mile broad, built in the form of a parallelogram, facing the north-east, and surrounded by a high wall and ditch. A hamlet should be a Yojana distant from a city; a village, half a Yojana from a hamlet. The roads leading to the cardinal points from a city should be twenty Dhanusas (above 100 feet) broad:

‡ In one of the four MSS, of the Váyu-purána that I have consulted, the verses quoted in the last note are introduced by a stanza and a half, at the beginning of which are the words Halfula Hamula! But these words mean nothing; and there is no reference to Manu. We here simply have a clerical error, in place of the opening words of the passage cited, in p. 92, from the Márkańdeya-purána. The forementioned MS, of the Váyu-purána must have been transcribed from a somewhat ancient copy, or from one in the Bengali character.

sorts of lentils, beans, and pease.¹ These are the kinds cultivated for domestic use. But there are fourteen kinds* which may be offered in sacrifice. They are: rice, barley, Másha, wheat, millet, and sesamum; Priyangu is the seventh, and Kulatthaka, pulse, the eighth. The others are: Śyámáka, a sort of panic; Nívára, uncultivated rice; Jartila, wild sesamum; Gavedhuká (coix barbata); Markataka, wild panic; and (a plant called) the seed or barley of the Bambu (Veńuyava).† These, a village road should be the same: a boundary road, ten Dhanusas: a royal or principal road or street should be ten Dhanusas (above fifty feet) broad: a cross or branch road should be four Dhanusas. Lanes and paths amongst the houses are two Dhanusas in breadth; footpaths, four cubits; the entrance of a house, three cubits; the private entrances and paths about the mansion, of still narrower dimensions.‡ Such were the measurements adopted by the first builders of cities, according to the Puránas specified.

The Váyu-purána, though professing to name only fourteen vegetable productions that may be used in sacrifice, names all that are mentioned in the Vishhu-purána, and one more. The fifteenth is kurubinda.

cultivated or wild, are the fourteen grains that were produced for purposes of offering in sacrifice; and sacrifice (the cause of rain) is their origin also. They, again, with sacrifice, are the great cause of the perpetuation of the human race; as those understand who can discriminate cause and effect. Thence sacrifices were offered daily; the performance of which, O best of Munis, is of essential service to mankind, and expiates the offences of those by whom they are observed. Those, however, in whose hearts the drop of sin derived from Time (Kála) was still more developed, assented not to sacrifices, but reviled both them and all that resulted from them, the gods, and the followers of the Vedas. Those abusers of the Vedas, of evil disposition and conduct, and seceders from the path of enjoined duties, were plunged in wickedness. 1 *

CHAPTER VII.

Creation continued. Production of the mind-born sons of Brahmá; of the Prajápatis; of Sanandana and others; of Rudra and the eleven Rudras; of the Manu Swáyambhuva and his wife Satarúpá; of their children. The daughters of Daksha, and their marriage to Dharma and others. The progeny of Dharma and Adharma. The perpetual succession of worlds, and different modes of mundane dissolution.

Paráśara.—From Brahmá, continuing to meditate, were born mind-engendered progeny, with forms and faculties derived from his corporeal nature; embodied spirits, produced from the person* of that all-wise† deity. All these beings, from the gods to inanimate things, appeared as I have related to you;¹ being the abode of the three qualities. But, as they did not multiply themselves, Brahmá created other mind-born sons, like himself; namely: Bhŕigu, Pulastya, Pulaha, Kratu, Angiras, Maríchi, Daksha, Atri, and Vasishtha. These are the nine Brahmás (or Brahmarshis) celebrated in the Puráńas.²; Sanandana and the other sons of Brahmá§

² Considerable variety prevails in this list of Prajápatis, Brahmaputras, Brahmás, or Brahmarshis; but the variations are of were previously created by him. But they were without desire or passion, inspired with holy wisdom, estranged the nature of additions made to an apparently original enumeration of but seven, whose names generally recur. Thus, in the Mahábhárata, Moksha Dharma, we have, in one place, Maríchi, Atri, Angiras, Pulastya, Pulaha, Kratu, and Vasishíha:

ब्रह्मणः सप्त वै पुत्रा महात्मानः खयंभुवः।*

'the seven high-minded sons of the self-born Brahmá.' In another place of the same, however, we have Daksha substituted for Vasishiha:

ब्रह्मानुसमृत्रे पुचान्मानसान्द् चसप्तमान् । मरीचिमच्यङ्गिरसं पुचस्त्यं पुचहं क्रतुम् ॥†

'Brahmá then created mind-begotten sons, of whom Daksha was the seventh, with Maríchi', &c. These seven sons of Brahmá are also identified with the seven Říshis; as in the Váyu:

भूयः सप्तर्वयस्तिव उत्पन्नाः सप्तमानसाः। पुत्रति काल्यिताशैव खयमेव खयंभुवः॥ although, with palpable inconsistency, eight are immediately enumerated; or: Bhŕigu, Maríchi, Atri, Angiras, Pulastya, Pulaha, Kratu, and Vasishíha. The Uttara Khańda of the Padma Puráńa substitutes Kardama for Vasishíha. The Bhágavata includes Daksha, enumerating nine.: The Matsya agrees with Manu, in adding Nárada to the list of our text. The Kúrma Puráńa adds Dharma and Sankalpa. The Linga, Brahmáńda, and Váyu Puráńas also add them, and extend the list to Adharma and Ruchi. The Hari Vamsa, in one place, inserts Gautama, and, in another, Manu. Altogether, therefore, we have seventeen, instead of seven. But the accounts given of the origin of several of these show that they were not, originally, included amongst the Mánasaputras or sons of Brahmá's mind; for even Daksha, who finds a place in all the lists except one of those given in the Mahábhárata, is ^{*} Śanti-parvan, 7569, 7570: and see 13075.

The Bhágavata-puráña, III., 12, 22, includes Daksha and Nárada; thus enumerating ten.

from the universe, and undesirous of progeny. This when Brahmá perceived, he was filled with wrath uniformly said to have sprung from Brahmá's thumb: and the same patriarch, as well as Dharma, is included, in some accounts, as in the Bhágavata and Matsya Puránas, amongst a different series of Brahmá's progeny, or virtues and vices; or: Daksha (dexterity), Dharma (virtue), Káma (desire), Krodha (passion), Lobha (covetousness), Moha (infatuation), Mada (insanity), Pramoda (pleasure), Mrityu (death), and Angaja (lust). These are severally derived from different parts of Brahma's body; and the Bhagavata, adding Kardama (soil, or sin) to this enumeration, makes him spring from Brahmá's shadow. The simple statement that the first Prajápatis sprang from the mind, or will, of Brahmá, has not contented the depraved taste of the mystics; and, in some of the Puránas, as the Bhágavata, Linga, and Váyu, they also are derived from the body of their progenitor; or: Bhrigu, from his skin; Marichi, from his mind; Atri, from his eyes; Angiras, from his mouth; Pulastya, from his ear; Pulaha, from his navel; Kratu, from his hand; Vasishtha, from his breath; Daksha, from his thumb; and Nárada, from his hip. They do not exactly agree, however, in the places whence these beings proceed; as, for instance, according to the Linga, Maríchi springs from Brahmá's eyes, not Atri, who, there, proceeds, instead of Pulastya, from his ears. The Váyu has, also, another account of their origin, and states them to have sprung from the fires of a sacrifice offered by Brahmá; an allegorical mode of expressing their probable original, -considering them to be, in some degree, real persons,from the Brahmanical ritual, of which they were the first institutors and observers. The Váyu Purána also states, that, besides the seven primitive Rishis, the Prajápatis are numerous, and specifies Kardama, Kaśyapa, Śesha, Vikránta, Suśravas, Bahuputra, Kumára, Vivaswat, Suchiśravas, Práchetasa (Daksha), Arishíanemi, Bahula. These and many others were Prajápatis:

इत्येवसादयोऽन्येऽपि वहवस प्रजेसराः।

In the beginning of the Mahábhárata (Ádi Parvan), we have, again, a different origin; and, first, Daksha, the son of the Prachetasas, it capable of consuming the three worlds, the flame of which invested, like a garland, heaven, earth, and hell. Then from his forehead, darkened with angry frowns, sprang Rudra, radiant as the noon-tide sun, fierce, is said, had seven sons, after whom the twenty-one Prajápatis were born, or appeared. According to the commentator, the seven sons of Daksha were the allegorical persons Krodha, Tamas, Dama, Vikíta, Angiras, Kardama, and Aśwa; and the twenty-one Prajápatis, the seven usually specified,—Maríchi and the rest,—and the fourteen Manus. This looks like a blending of the earlier and later notions.

Besides this general notice of the origin of Rudra and his separate forms, we have, in the next chapter, an entirely different set of beings so denominated; and the eleven alluded to in the text are also more particularly enumerated in a subsequent chapter. The origin of Rudra, as one of the agents in creation, is described in most of the Puránas. The Mahábhárata, indeed, refers his origin to Visháu; representing him as the personification of his anger, whilst Brahmá is that of his kindness:

श्रद्धः चये जलाटाच सुतो देवस वै तथा। कोधाविष्टस संज्ञे रद्धः संहारकारकः। एतो दो विवुधयेष्ठौ प्रसादकोधजावुभी। तदादिशितपन्थानौ सृष्टिसंहारकारको॥

The Kúrma Puráńa makes him proceed from Brahmá's mouth, whilst engaged in meditating on creation. The Varáha Puráńa makes this appearance of Rudra the consequence of a promise made by Siva to Brahmá, that he would become his son. In the parallel passages in other Puráńas, the progeny of the Rudra created by Brahmá is not confined to the eleven, but comprehends infinite numbers of beings, in person and equipments like their parent; until Brahmá, alarmed at their fierceness, numbers, and immortality, desires his son Rudra, or, as the Matsya calls him, Vámadeva, to form creatures of a different and mortal nature. Rudra refusing to do this, desists; whence his name Stháńu, from Sthá, 'to stay'. Linga, Váyu Puráńas, &c.

and of vast bulk, and of a figure which was half male, half female. Separate yourself, Brahmá said to him, and, having so spoken, disappeared; obedient to which command, Rudra became twofold, disjoining his male and female natures. His male being he again divided into eleven persons, of whom some were agreeable, some hideous; some fierce, some mild.* And he multiplied his female nature manifold, of complexions black or white. 1†

Then Brahmá² created, himself, the Manu Swáyam-

¹ According to the Váyu, the female became, first, twofold, or one half white, and the other, black; and each of these, again, becomes manifold, being the various energies or Saktis of Mahádeva, as stated by the Kúrma, after the words र्वर्प्यातः सितः। which are those of our text:

ता वे विभूतयो विप्रा विश्वताः श्रुत्तयो सुवि।
The Linga and Váyu specify many of their names. Those of the white complexion, or mild nature, include Lakshmi, Saraswati, Gauri, Umá, &c.; those of the dark hue, and fierce disposition, Durgá, Kálí, Chańdí, Mahárátri, and others.

² Brahmá, after detaching from himself the property of anger, in the form of Rudra, converted himself into two persons, the first male, or the Manu Swáyambhuva, and the first woman, or Śatarúpá. So, in the Vedas: एवासा व पुनी नामासीत्। 'So himself was indeed (his) son.' The commencement of production through sexual agency is here described with sufficient distinctness; but the subject has been rendered obscure by a more com-

^{*} According to the commentator, "fierce" and "mild" are exepegetical of "agreeable" and "hideous".

[†] This quotation requires to be slightly altered. The commentator, after citing आत्मानमेन from the Vishiu-purána, proceeds: आता ने पुननामासीति श्रुते:। These words, ending with पुननामासि, are from the Satapatha-brahmana, XIV, 9, 4, 26.

bhuva, born of, and identical with, his original self, for the protection of created beings: and the female plicated succession of agents, and, especially, by the introduction of a person of a mythic or mystical character, Viráj. The notion is thus expressed in Manu: "Having divided his own substance. the mighty power Brahmá became half male and half female; and from that female he produced Viráj. Know me to be that person whom the male Viráj produced by himself." I. 32, 33.* We have, therefore, a series of Brahmá, Viráj, and Manu, instead of Brahmá and Manu only; also the generation of progeny by Brahmá, begotten on Śatarupá, instead of her being, as in our text, the wife of Manu. The idea seems to have originated with the Vedas, as Kullúka Bhatta quotes a text: ततो विराह्यायत। 'Then (or thence) Viráj was born'. The procreation of progeny by Brahmá, however, is at variance with the whole system, which, almost invariably, refers his creation to the operation of his will: and the expression, in Manu, तस्यां स विराजमसज्जत । 'he created Viráj in her', does not necessarily imply sexual intercourse. Viráj also creates, not begets, Manu. And in neither instance does the name of Satarupa occur. The commentator on Manu, however, understands the expression Asrijat to imply the procreation of Viráj: मैथनेन धर्मेण । and the same interpretation is given by the Matsya Purána, in which the incestuous passion of Brahmá for Śatarupa,-his daughter, in one sense, his sister, in another,-is described; and by her he begets Viráj, who there is called, not the progenitor of Manu, but Manu himself:

ततः कालेन महता तखाः पुत्रोऽभवन्मनः। खायंभुव इति खातः स विराडिति नः श्रुतम्॥†

This, therefore, agrees with our text, as far as it makes Manu the son of Brahmá, though not as to the nature of the connexion.

हिधा कृत्वातानो देहमर्थेन पुरुषीऽभवत्। अर्थेन नारी तस्यां स विराजमसृजत्प्रभुः॥ तपसाप्तासृजयन्तु स स्वयं पुरुषी विराट्। तं मां वित्तास्य सर्वस्य सष्टारं द्विजसत्तमाः॥ † Matsya-purána, III., 49, 50.

portion of himself he constituted Satarúpá, whom austerity purified from the sin (of forbidden nuptials),

The reading of the Agni and Padma Puránas is that of the Vishnu: and the Bhágavata agrees with it, in one place; stating, distinctly, that the male half of Brahmá was Manu, the other half, Śatarúpá:

यसु तच पुमान्सोऽभूचानुः खायंभुवः खराट्। स्त्री यासीच्छतक्पाखा महिष्यस महातानः॥

Bhágavata, III., 12, 53, 54: and, although the production of Viráj is elsewhere described, it is neither as the son of Brahmá nor the father of Manu. The original and simple idea, therefore, appears to be, the identity of Manu with the male half of Brahmá, and his being, thence, regarded as his son. The Kurma Purana gives the same account as Manu, and in the same words. The Linga Purána and Váyu Purána describe the origin of Viráj and Satarupá from Brahmá; and they intimate the union of Satarupá with Purusha or Viráj, the male portion of Brahmá, in the first instance, and, in the second, with Manu, who is termed Vairaja, or the son of Viráj: विराजस्त मनु: सात:। The Brahma Purána, the words of which are repeated in the Hari Vamsa, introduces a new element of perplexity, in a new name, that of Apava. According to the commentator, this is a name of the Prajapati Vasishtha: आपवर्षविसिष्ठापरनामः प्रजापते:। As, however, he performs the office of Brahmá, he should be regarded as that divinity. But this is not exactly the case, although it has been so rendered by the French translator. Apava becomes twofold, and, in the capacity of his male half, begets offspring by the female. Again, it is said Vishnu created Viráj, and Viráj created the male, which is Vairaja or Manu; who was, thus, the second interval (Antara) or stage in creation. That is, according to the commentator, the first stage was the creation of Apava, or Vasishtha, or Viráj, by Vishnu, through the agency of Hiranyagarbha or Brahmá; and the next was that of the creation of Manu by Viráj. Satarupá appears as, first, the bride of Apava, and then as the wife of Mana. This account, therefore, although obscurely expressed, appears to be essentially the same with that of Manu; and whom the divine Manu Swayambhuva took to wife. From these two were born two sons, Priyavrata and and we have Brahmá, Viráj, Manu, instead of Brahmá and Manu. It seems probable that this difference, and the part assigned to Viráj, has originated, in some measure, from confounding Brahmá with the male half of his individuality, and considering as two beings that which was but one. If the Purusha or Viráj be distinct from Brahmá, what becomes of Brahmá? The entire whole and its two halves cannot coexist; although some of the Paurániks and the author of Manu seem to have imagined its possibility, by making Viráj the son of Brahmá. The perplexity, however, is still more ascribable to the personification of that which was only an allegory. The division of Brahma into two halves designates, as is very evident from the passage in the Vedas given by Mr. Colebrooke, (As. R., VIII., 425,*) the distinction of corporeal substance into two sexes; Viráj being all male animals, Satarupa, all female animals. So the commentator on the Hari Vamsa explains the former to denote the horse, the bull, &c., and the latter, the mare, the cow, and the like. In the Bhágavata, the term Viráj implies Body collectively, as the commentator observes: समष्टिशारीरं स्वधिष्यं प्रतपत्पामो बहिस प्रतपत्यसावेवं विराजं प्रतपंत्रपत्यन्तर्वहिः पुमान्। 'As the sun illuminates his own inner sphere, as well as the exterior regions. so soul, shining in body (Virája), irradiates all without and within.' विराडेहं प्रकाशयन्त्रह्माण्डं प्रकाश्यति। All, therefore, that the birth of Viráj was intended to express, was, the creation of living body, of creatures of both sexes; and, as, in consequence, man was produced, he might be said to be the son of Viráj, or bodily existence. Again, Satarupa, the bride of Brahma, or of Viráj, or of Manu, is nothing more than beings of varied or manifold forms, from Sata, 'a hundred', and og 'form'; explained, by the annotator on the Hari Vamsa, by Anantarupa (अन्तर्पा), of infinite', and Vividharupá (fafaucur), of diversified shape'; being, as he states, the same as Máyá, 'illusion', or the power of multiform metamorphosis: अनेक प्यार्णसामर्थ। The Matsya Puráńa has a little allegory of its own, on the subject of Brahmá's intercourse with Śatarúpá; for it explains the former to mean the Vedas, and the latter, the Sávitrí or holy prayer, which is their chief text; and in their cohabitation there is, therefore, no evil:

वेदराशिः सृतो ब्रह्मा साविची तद्धिष्ठिता। तस्मान कश्चिद्दोषः स्थात्साविचीगमने विभोः॥†

¹ The Brahma Purána has a different order, and makes Víra the son of the first pair, who has Uttánapáda, &c. by Kámyá. The commentator on the Hari Vamsa quotes the Váyu for a confirmation of this account. But the passage there is:

वैराजात्पुरुषाद्वीरी ग्रतक्ष्पा व्यजायत । ग्रियव्रतोत्तानपादी पुत्री पुत्रवतां वरी ॥

'Satarupa' bore to the male Vairaja (Manu) two Viras', i. e., heroes, or heroic sons, Uttánapada and Priyavrata. It looks as if the compiler of the Brahma Purana had made some very unaccountable blunder, and invented, upon it, a new couple, Vira and Kamya. No such person as the former occurs in any other Purana; nor does Kamya, as his wife.

² The Bhágavata adds a third daughter, Devahúti; for the purpose, apparently, of introducing a long legend of the Řishi Kardama, to whom she is married, and of their son Kapila: a legend not met with anywhere else.

became husband and wife, and had twelve sons, the deities called Yámas, in the Manwantara of Swáyam-bhuva.

The patriarch Daksha had, by Prasúti, twenty-four daughters.2 Hear from me their names: Śraddhá (faith), Lakshmí (prosperity), Dhřiti (steadiness), Tushti (resignation), Pushti (thriving), Medhá (intelligence), Kriyá (action, devotion), Buddhi (intellect), Lajjá (modesty), Vapus (body), Śánti (expiation), Siddhi (perfection), Kírtti (fame). These thirteen daughters of Daksha, Dharma (righteousness) took to wife. The other eleven bright-eyed and younger daughters of the patriarch were: Khyáti (celebrity), Satí (truth), Sambhúti (fitness), Smriti (memory), Príti (affection), Kshamá (patience), Samnati (humility), Anasúyá (charity), Urjá (energy), with Swáhá (offering), and Swadhá (oblation). These maidens were respectively wedded to the Munis Bhrigu, Bhava, Maríchi, Angiras, Pulastva, Pulaha, Kratu, Atri, and Vasishtha, to Fire (Vahni),* and to the Pitris (progenitors). 3+

¹ The Bhágavata (b. IV. c. 1) says the Tushitas: but they are the divinities of the second, not of the first, Manwantara; as appears also in another part of the same, where the Yámas are likewise referred to the Swáyambhuva Manwantara.

² These twenty-four daughters are of much less universal occurrence in the Puránas than the more extensive series of fifty or sixty, which is subsequently described, and which appears to be the more ancient legend.

³ The twenty-four daughters of Daksha are similarly named

The progeny of Dharma, by the daughters of Daksha, were as follows: by Śraddhá, he had Káma (desire); by Lakshmí,* Darpa (pride); by Dhŕiti, Niyama (precept); by Tushti, Santosha (content); by Pushti, Lobha (cupidity); by Medhá, Śruta (sacred tradition); by Kriyá, Dańda, Naya, and Vinaya (correction, polity, and prudence); by Buddhi, Bodha (understanding); by Lajjá, Vinaya (good behaviour); by Vapus, Vyavasáya (perseverance). and disposed of in most of the Puranas which notice them. The Bhágavata, having introduced a third daughter of Swáyambhuva, has a rather different enumeration, in order to assign some of them, the wives of the Prajápatis, to Kardama and Devahúti. Daksha had, therefore, it is there said (b. IV. c. 1), sixteen daughters, thirteen of whom were married to Dharma, named Śraddhá, Maitri (friendship), Dayá (clemency), Śánti, Tushti, Pushti, Kriyá, Unnati (elevation), Buddhi, Medhá, Titikshá (patience), Hri (modesty), Múrti (form); and three, Satí, Swáhá, and Swadhá, married, as in our text. Some of the daughters of Devaluti repeat these appellations; but that is of slight consideration. They are: Kalá (a moment), married to Maríchi; Anasúyá, to Atri; Śraddhá, to Angiras; Havirbhú (oblation-born), to Pulastya; Gati (movement), to Pulaha; Kriyá, to Kratu; Khyáti, to Bhŕigu; Arundhatí, to Vasishtha; and Sánti, to Atharvan. + In all these instances, the persons are, manifestly, allegorical, being personifications of intelligences and virtues and religious rites, and being, therefore, appropriately wedded to the probable authors of the Hindu code of religion and morals, or to the equally allegorical representation of that code, Dharma. moral and religious duty.

Yasas (reputation). These were the sons of Dharma; one of whom, Káma, had Harsha (joy) by his wife Nandí (delight).

The wife of Adharma2 (vice) was Himsá (violence), on whom he begot a son, Anrita (falsehood), and a daughter, Nikriti (immorality). They intermarried, and had two sons, Bhaya (fear) and Naraka (hell); and

² The text rather abruptly introduces Adharma and his family. He is said, by the commentator, to be the son of Brahmá; and the Linga Purána enumerates him amongst the Prajápatis, as well as Dharma. According to the Bhagavata, he is the husband of Mŕishá (falsehood), and the father of Dambha (hypocrisy) and Máyá (deceit), who were adopted by Nirriti. The series of their descendants is, also, somewhat varied from our text; being, in each descent, however, twins, which intermarry, or: Lobha (covetousness) and Nikriti, who produce Krodha (wrath) and Himsa: their children are Kali (wickedness) and Durukti (evil speech): their progeny are Mrityu and Bhi (fear); whose offspring are Niraya (hell) and Yátaná (torment).

twins to them, two daughters, Máyá (deceit) and Vedaná (torture), who became their wives. The son of Bhaya and Máyá was the destroyer of living creatures, or Mrityu (death); and Duhkha (pain) was the offspring of Naraka* and Vedaná. The children of Mrityu were: Vyádhi (disease), Jará (decay), Śoka (sorrow), Třishňá (greediness), and Krodha (wrath). These are all called the inflictors of misery, and are characterized as the progeny of Vice+ (Adharma). They are all without wives, without posterity, without the faculty to procreate. They are the terrific forms of Vishnu, and perpetually operate as causes of the destruction of this world. On the contrary, Daksha and the other Rishis,§ the elders of mankind, tend perpetually to influence its renovation; whilst the Manus and their sons, the heroes endowed with mighty power, and treading in the path of truth, as constantly contribute to its preservation.

1 The three first of these are more particularly described in the last book. The last, the Nitya or constant, is differently described by Colonel Vans Kennedy (Researches into the Nature and Affinity of Ancient and Hindu Mythology, p. 224, note). "In the seventh chapter, however", he observes, "of the first part of the Vishnu Purána, it is said that the naimittika, prákřitika, átyantika, and nitya are the four kinds of pralaya to which created things are subject. The naimittika takes place when Brahmá slumbers; the prákritika, when this universe returns to its original nature: atyantika proceeds from divine knowledge, and consequent identification with the supreme spirit; and nitya is the extinction of life, like the extinction of a lamp, in sleep at night." For this last characteristic, however, our text furnishes no warrant. Nor can it be explained to signify, that the Nitya Pralaya means no more than "a man's falling into sound sleep at night". All the copies consulted on the present occasion concur in reading:

नित्यः सदैव जातानां यो विनाभो दिवानिभ्रम् । as rendered above. The commentator supplies the illustration, दीपज्ञालावत् । 'like the flame of a lamp'; but he also writes: जातानां दिवानिभ्रं यो विनाभः स नित्यः। 'That which is the destruction of all that are born, night and day, is the Nitya or constant.' Again, in a verse presently following, we have the Nitya Sarga, 'constant or perpetual creation', as opposed to con-dissolution, occurs when the sovereign of the world reclines in sleep. In the second, the mundane egg resolves into the primary element, from whence it was derived. Absolute non-existence of the world is the absorption of the sage,* through knowledge, into supreme spirit. Perpetual destruction is the constant disappearance, day and night, of all that are born. The productions of Prakriti form the creation that is termed the elemental (Prákŕita). That which ensues after a minor dissolution is called ephemeral creation; and the daily generation of living things is termed, by those who are versed in the Puránas, constant creation. In this manner, the mighty Vishnu, whose essence is the elements, abides in all bodies, and brings about production, existence, and dissolution. † The faculties of Vishńu, to create, to preserve, and to destroy, operate successively, Maitreya, in all corporeal beings, and at all seasons; and he who frees himself from the influence of these three faculties, which are essentially composed of the three qualities (goodness, foulness, and darkness), goes to the supreme sphere, from whence he never again returns.

CHAPTER VIII.

Origin of Rudra: his becoming eight Rudras: their wives and children. The posterity of Bhrigu. Account of Śrí in conjunction with Vishnu. (Sacrifice of Daksha.)

Parásara.—I have described to you, O great Muni, the creation of Brahmá in which the quality of darkness prevailed. I will now explain to you the creation of Rudra.¹

In the beginning of the Kalpa, as Brahmá purposed to create a son, who should be like himself, a youth of a purple complexion² appeared; crying with a low cry, and running about.³ Brahmá, when he beheld him thus afflicted, said to him: "Why dost thou weep?" "Give me a name", replied the boy. "Rudra be thy name", rejoined the great father of all creatures: "be composed; desist from tears." But, thus addressed,

² The appearance of Rudra as a Kumára, 'a boy', is described, as of repeated occurrence, in the Linga and Váyu Puránas, as already noticed (pp. 76, et seq.); and these Kumáras are of different complexions in different Kalpas. In the Vaishúava Puránas, however, we have only one original form, to which the name of Nílalohita, 'the blue and red or purple complexioned', is assigned. In the Kúrma, this youth comes from Brahmá's mouth; in the Váyu, from his forehead.

This is the Pauranik etymology: रोदनाइवनाचेव रद्र: I or Rud, 'to weep', and Dru, 'to run'. The grammarians derive the name from Rud, 'to weep', with Rak affix.

the boy still wept seven times; and Brahmá therefore gave to him seven other denominations: and to these eight persons regions and wives and posterity belong. The eight manifestations, then, are named Rudra, Bhava, Śarva, Íśána, Paśupati, Bhíma, Ugra, and Mahádeva, which were given to them by their great progenitor.* He also assigned to them their respective stations, the sun, water, earth, air, fire, ther, the ministrant Brahman, and the moon; for these are their several forms. The wives of the sun and the other

¹ The Váyu details the application of each name severally. These eight Rudras are, therefore, but one, under as many appellations, and in as many types. The Padma, Markandeya, Kúrma, Linga, and Vávu agree with our text in the nomenclature of the Rudras, and their types, their wives, and progeny. The types are those which are enumerated in the Nándí or opening benedictory verse of Śakuntalá; and the passage of the Vishńu Purána was found, by M. Chezy, on the envelope of his copy. He has justly corrected Sir William Jones's version of the term होची, 'the sacrifice is performed with solemnity'; as the word means, 'Brahmane officiant', दीचितो ब्राह्मण:। 'the Brahman who is qualified, by initiation (Díkshá), to conduct the rite.' These are considered as the bodies, or visible forms, of those modifications of Rudra which are variously named, and which, being praised in them, severally abstain from harming them: तेषु पूज्यस वन्तः स्थात् । बहस्तान्न हिनस्ति वै। Váyu Puráúa. The Bhágavata, III., 12, 11-13, has a different scheme, as usual; but it confounds the notion of the eleven Rudras, to whom the text subsequently adverts, with that of the eight to intimate a struggle between the worshippers of Siva and of Vishnu, in which, at first, the latter, but, finally, the former, acquired the ascendancy. It is, also, a favourite subject of Hindu sculpture, at least with the Hindus of the Saiva division, and makes a conspicuous figure both at Elephanta and Ellora. A representation of the dispersion and mutilation of the gods and sages by Virabhadra, at the former, is published in the Archæologia, Vol. VII., 326, where it is described as the Judgment of Solomon! A figure of Virabhadra is given by Niebuhr, Vol. II., tab. 10; and the entire group, in the Bombay Transactions, Vol. I., p. 220. It is described, p. 229: but Mr. Erskine has not verified the subject, although it cannot admit of doubt. The group described, p. 224, probably represents the introductory details given in our text. Of the Ellora sculptures, a striking one occurs in what Sir C. Malet calls the Doomar Leyna cave, where is "Veer Budder, with eight hands. In one is suspended the slain Rajah Dutz." A. R. Vol. VI., 396. And there is also a representation of 'Ehr Budr' in one of the colonnades of Kailas; being, in fact, the same figure as that at Elephanta. Bombay Tr., Vol. III., 287. The legend of Daksha, therefore, was popular when those cavern temples were excavated. The story is told in much more detail in several other Puranas, and with some variations, which will be noticed: but the above has been selected as a specimen of the style of the Váyu Purána, and as being a narration which, from its inartificial, obscure, tautological, and uncircumstantial construction, is, probably, of an ancient date. The same legend, in the same words, is given in the Brahma Purána.

dwara, frequented by the Rishis. The gods, desirous of assisting at this solemn rite, came, with Indra* at their head, to Mahádeva, and intimated their purpose, and, having received his permission, departed, in their splendid chariots, to Gangádwára, as tradition reports.1 They found Daksha, the best of the devout, surrounded by the singers and nymphs of heaven, and by numerous sages, beneath the shade of clustering trees and climbing plants; and all of them, whether dwellers on earth, in air, or in the regions above the skies, approached the patriarch with outward gestures of respect. The Adityas, Vasus, Rudras, † Maruts, all entitled to partake of the oblations, together with Jishnu, were present. The (four classes of Pitris) Ushmapas, Somapas, Ajyapas, and Dhúmapas, (or those who feed upon the flame, the acid juice, the butter, or the smoke of offerings), the Aświns, and the progenitors, came along with Brahmá. Creatures of every class, born from the womb, the egg, from vapour, or vegetation, came upon their invocation; as did all the gods, with their brides, who, in their resplendent vehicles, blazed like so many fires.

^{&#}x27; Or this may be understood to imply, that the original story is in the Vedas; the term being, as usual in such a reference, 文何 契何: | Gangádwára, the place where the Ganges descends to the plains—or Haridwár, as it is more usually termed—is usually specified as the scene of action. The Linga is more precise, calling it Kanakhala, which is the village still called Kankhal, near Haridwár (Megha Dúta, p. 59). It rather inaccurately, however, describes this as upon Hamsa peak, a point of the Himálaya: हमगुड़ हिम्बिक्सरे।

Beholding them thus assembled, the sage Dadhícha was filled with indignation, and observed: 'The man who worships what ought not to be worshipped, or pays not reverence where veneration is due, is guilty, most assuredly, of heinous sin.' Then, addressing Daksha, he said to him: 'Why do you not offer homage to the god who is the lord of life* (Pasubhartri)?' Daksha spake: 'I have already many Rudras present, armed with tridents, wearing braided hair, and existing in eleven forms. I recognize no other Mahádeva.' Dadhícha spake: 'The invocation that is not addressed to Íśa is, for all, but a solitary (and imperfect) summons. Inasmuch as I behold no other divinity who is superior to Śankara, this sacrifice of Daksha will not be completed.' Daksha spake: 'I offer, in a golden cup, this entire oblation, which has been consecrated by many prayers, as an offering ever due to the unequalled Vishńu, the sovereign lord of all."

 चथाहं ग्रंकरादूर्धं नान्यं प्रश्नामि दैवतम्॥
 तथा दश्चस्य विपुनी यश्चीऽयं न भविष्यति।

For the text, from the Mahábhárata, of a passage nearly identical with that in which these verses occur, accompanied by a very different rendering from that given above, see Original Sanskrit Texts, Part IV., pp. 314, et seq.

The epithet makhesa, "lord of sacrifice", is here omitted.

¹ The Kúrma Purána gives also this discussion between Dadhícha and Daksha; and their dialogue contains some curious matter. Daksha, for instance, states that no portion of a sacrifice is ever allotted to Śiva, and no prayers are directed to be addressed to him, or to his bride:

^{*} Rather, "the guardian of animals fit for sacrifice".

"In the meanwhile the virtuous daughter of the mountain king, observing the departure of the divinities, addressed her lord, the god of living beings, and said—Umá spake—'Whither, O lord, have the gods, preceded by Indra," this day departed? Tell me truly,

सर्वेष्वेव हि यज्ञेषु न भागः परिकल्पितः। न मन्त्रा भार्यया सार्धे ग्रंकरस्रेति नेष्यते॥

Dadhícha apparently evades the objection, and claims a share for Rudra, consisting of the triad of gods, as one with the sun, who is, undoubtedly, hymned by the several ministering priests of the Vedas:

स सूर्यते सहसांगुः सामगाध्वर्यहोतृभिः। पश्चैनं विश्वकर्माणं रुद्रं मूर्तिचयीमयम्॥

Daksha replies that the twelve Adityas receive special oblations; that they are all the suns; and that he knows of no other. The Munis, who overhear the dispute, concur in his sentiments:

य एते द्वादशादित्या आदित्ययज्ञभागिनः।
सर्वे सूर्या इति ज्ञेया न ह्यन्यो विवते रिवः॥ एवसुते तु सुनयः समायाता दिदृचवः।
वाडमिलवृतन्द्वं तस्य साहास्यकारिणः॥

These notions seem to have been exchanged for others, in the days of the Padma Puráúa and Bhágavata; as they place Daksha's neglect of Śiva to the latter's filthy practices,—his going naked, smearing himself with ashes, carrying a skull, and behaving as if he were drunk or crazed; alluding, no doubt, to the practices of Śaiva mendicants, who seem to have abounded in the days of Śankara Achárya, and since. There is no discussion in the Bhágavata; but Rudra is described as present at a former assembly, when his father-in-law censured him before the guests, and, in consequence, he departed in a rage. His follower Nandin; curses the company; and Bhígu retorts, in language descriptive of the Vámácharins or left hand worshippers of Śiva. "May all those", my frame. Shall I now practise bounty, restraint, or penance, so that my lord, who is inconceivable, may obtain a share,—a half, or a third portion,—of the sacrifice?'

"Then the mighty and incomprehensible deity, being pleased, said to his bride, thus agitated and speaking: 'Slender-waisted queen of the gods, thou knowest not the purport of what thou sayest. But I know it, O thou with large eyes; for the holy declare all things by meditation. By thy perplexity this day are all the gods,

This simple account of Sati's share in the transaction is considerably modified in other accounts. In the Kurma, the quarrel begins with Daksha the patriarch's being, as he thinks, treated, by his son-in-law, with less respect than is his due. Upon his daughter Sati's subsequently visiting him, he abuses her husband, and turns her out of his house. She, in spite, destroys herself: Ecisian and it is Siva, hearing of this, comes to Daksha, and curses him to be born as a Kshatriya, the son of the Prachetasas, and to beget a son on his own daughter:

It is in this subsequent birth that the sacrifice occurs. The Linga and Matsya allude to the dispute between Daksha and Satí, and to the latter's putting an end to herself by Yoga:

भसी हत्यातानी देहं योगमार्गेण सा पुनः।

The Padma, Bhágavata, and Skanda,—in the Káśi Khańda,—relate the dispute between father and daughter in a like manner, and in more detail. The first refers the death of Sati, however, to a prior period; and that and the Bhágavata both ascribe it to Yoga:

द्दर्भ देही हतनस्म : सती सवः प्रजञ्जास समाधिनापिना।

The Kásí Khańda, with an improvement indicative of a later age, makes Satí throw herself into the fire prepared for the solemnity.

with Mahendra and all the three worlds, utterly confounded. In my sacrifice, those who worship me repeat my praises, and chant the Rathantara song of the Sámaveda. Mahádeva spake: 'Queen of the gods, I praise not myself. Approach, and behold whom I shall create for the purpose of claiming my share of the rite.'

"Having thus spoken to his beloved spouse, the mighty Maheśwara created, from his mouth, a being like the fire of fate; a divine being, with a thousand heads, a thousand eyes, a thousand feet; wielding a thousand clubs, a thousand shafts; holding the shell, the discus, the mace, and bearing a blazing bow and battle-axe; § fierce and terrific, shining with dreadful splendour, and decorated with the crescent moon; clothed in a tiger's skin dripping with blood, having a capacious stomach, and a vast mouth armed with formidable tusks. His ears were erect; his lips were pendulous; his tongue was lightning; his hand brandished the thunder bolt: flames streamed from his hair; a necklace of pearls wound round his neck; a garland of flame descended on his breast. extended from ear to ear. He was of vast bulk, vast strength, a mighty male and lord, the destroyer of the universe, and like a large fig-tree in circumference; shining like a hundred moons at once; fierce as the fire of love; having four heads, sharp white teeth, and of mighty fierceness, vigour, activity, and courage; glowing with the blaze of a thousand fiery suns at the end of the world; like a thousand undimmed moons; in bulk, like Himádri, Kailása, or Sumeru, or Mandara, with all its gleaming herbs; bright as the sun of destruction at the end of ages; of irresistible prowess and beautiful aspect; irascible, with lowering eyes, and a countenance burning like fire; clothed in the hide of the elephant and lion,* and girt round with snakes: wearing a turban on his head, a moon on his brow; sometimes savage, sometimes mild; having a chaplet of many flowers on his head, anointed with various unguents, adorned with different ornaments and many sorts of jewels, wearing a garland of heavenly Karńikára flowers, and rolling his eyes with rage. Sometimes he danced; sometimes he laughed aloud; sometimes he stood wrapt in meditation; sometimes he trampled upon the earth; sometimes he sang; sometimes he wept repeatedly. And he was endowed with the faculties of wisdom, dispassion, power, penance, truth, endurance, fortitude, dominion, and self-knowledge.

"This being then knelt down upon the ground, and, raising his hands respectfully to his head, said to Mahádeva: 'Sovereign of the gods, command what it

Then the mighty Vírabhadra, having heard the pleasure of his lord, bowed down his head to the feet of Prajapati, and, starting like a lion loosed from bonds, despoiled the sacrifice of Daksha; knowing that he had been created by the displeasure of Deví. She, too, in her wrath, as the fearful goddess Rudrakálí, accompanied him, with all her train, to witness his deeds. Vírabhadra, the fierce, abiding in the region of ghosts, is the minister of the anger of Deví. And he then created, from the pores of his skin, powerful demigods, the mighty attendants upon Rudra, of equal valour and strength, who started, by hundreds and thousands, into existence. Then a loud and confused clamour filled all the expanse of ether, and inspired the denizens of heaven with dread. The mountains tottered, and earth shook; the winds roared, and the depths of the sea were disturbed; the fires lost their radiance, and the sun grew pale; the planets of the firmament shone not, neither did the stars give light; the Rishis ceased their hymns, and gods and demons were mute; and thick darkness eclipsed the chariots of the skies. 1; broke or overturned the sacrificial columns, trampled upon the altars, and danced amidst the oblations. Running wildly hither and thither, with the speed of wind, they tossed about the implements and vessels of sacrifice, which looked like stars precipitated from the heavens. The piles of food and beverage for the gods, which had been heaped up like mountains: the rivers of milk; the banks of curds and butter: the sands of honey, and butter-milk, and sugar; the mounds of condiments and spices of every flavour; the undulating knolls of flesh and other viands; the celestial liquors, pastes, and confections, which had been prepared; these the spirits of wrath devoured, or defiled, or scattered abroad. Then, falling upon the host of the gods, these vast and resistless Rudras beat or terrified them, mocked and insulted the nymphs and goddesses, and quickly put an end to the rite, although defended by all the gods; being the ministers of Rudra's wrath, and similar to himself. 1 Some then made a hideous clamour, whilst others fearfully shouted, when Yajna was decapitated. For the divine Yajna, the lord of sacrifice, then began to fly up to heaven, in the shape of a deer; and Vírabhadra, of immeasurable spirit, apprehending his power, cut off his vast head, after he had mounted into the sky. Daksha, the patriarch, his sacrifice being destroyed, overcome with terror, and utterly broken in spirit, fell, then, upon the ground, where his head was spurned by the feet of the cruel Vírabhadra. The thirty scores of sacred divinities were all presently

² As he prays to Siva presently, it could not well be meant, here, that Daksha was decapitated, although that is the story in other places. The Linga and Bhágavata both state that Vírabhadra cut off Daksha's head, and threw it into the fire. After the fray, therefore, when Siva restored the dead to life, and the mutilated to their limbs, Daksha's head was not forthcoming. It was, therefore, replaced by the head of a goat, or, according to the Kási Khańda, that of a ram. No notice is taken, in our text, of the conflict elsewhere described between Vírabhadra and Vishnu. In the Linga, the latter is beheaded; and his head is blown, by the wind, into the fire. The Kurma, though a Saiva Purána, is less irreverent towards Vishnu, and, after describing a contest in which both parties occasionally prevail, makes Brahmá interpose, and separate the combatants. The Kásí Khańda of the Skanda Purána describes Vishnu as defeated, and at the mercy of Virabhadra, who is prohibited, by a voice from heaven, from destroying his antagonist; whilst, in the Hari Vamsa, Vishnu compels Siva to fly, after taking him by the throat and nearly strangling him. The blackness of Siva's neck arose from this throttling, and not, as elsewhere described, from his drinking the poison produced at the churning of the ocean.

bound, with a band of fire, by their lion-like foe; and they all then addressed him, crying: 'O Rudra, have mercy upon thy servants! O lord, dismiss thine anger!' Thus spake Brahmá, and the other gods, and the patriarch Daksha; and, raising their hands, they said: 'Declare, mighty being, who thou art.' Vírabhadra said: 'I am not a god, nor an Áditya; nor am I come hither for enjoyment, nor curious to behold the chiefs of the divinities. Know that I am come to destroy the sacrifice of Daksha, and that I am called Vírabhadra, the issue of the wrath of Rudra. Bhadrakálí, also, who has sprung from the anger of Deví, is sent here, by the god of gods, to destroy this rite. Take refuge, king of kings, with him who is the lord of Umá. For better is the anger of Rudra than the blessings of other gods.'

"Having heard the words of Vírabhadra, the righteous Daksha propitiated the mighty god, the holder of the trident, Maheśwara. The hearth of sacrifice. deserted by the Brahmans, had been consumed; Yajna had been metamorphosed to an antelope; the fires of Rudra's wrath had been kindled; the attendants, wounded by the tridents of the servants of the god, were groaning with pain; the pieces of the uprooted sacrificial posts were scattered here and there; and the fragments of the meat-offerings were carried off by flights of hungry vultures and herds of howling jackals. Suppressing his vital airs, and taking up a posture of meditation, the many-sighted victor of his foes, Daksha, fixed his eyes everywhere upon his thoughts. Then the god of gods appeared from the altar, resplendent as a thousand suns, and smiled upon him, and said: 'Daksha, thy sacrifice has been destroyed through sacred knowledge. I am well pleased with thee.' And then he smiled again, and said: 'What shall I do for thee? Declare, together with the preceptor of the gods.'

"Then Daksha, frightened, alarmed, and agitated, his eyes suffused with tears, raised his hands reverentially to his brow, and said: 'If, lord, thou art pleased; if I have found favour in thy sight; if I am to be the object of thy benevolence; if thou wilt confer upon me a boon, this is the blessing I solicit, that all these provisions for the solemn sacrifice, which have been collected with much trouble, and during a long time, and which have now been eaten, drunk, devoured, burnt, broken, scattered abroad, may not have been prepared in vain.' 'So let it be', replied Hara, the subduer of Indra.* And thereupon Daksha knelt down upon the earth, and praised, gratefully, the author of righteousness, the three-eyed god Mahádeva, repeating the eight thousand names of the deity whose emblem is a bull."

Legend of Lakshmi. Durvásas gives a garland to Indra: he treats it disrespectfully, and is cursed by the Muni. The power of the gods impaired: they are oppressed by the Dánavas, and have recourse to Vishnu. The churning of the ocean. Praises of Śrí.

Parasara.—But, with respect to the question thou hast asked me, Maitreya, relating to the history of Śrí, hear from me the tale, as it was told to me by Maríchi.

Durvásas, a portion of Śankara (Śiva), was wandering over the earth; when he beheld, in the hands of a nymph of air, a garland of flowers culled from the trees of heaven, the fragrant odour of which spread throughout the forest, and enraptured all who dwelt beneath its shade. The sage, who was then possessed by religious phrensy, when he beheld that garland, demanded it of the graceful and full-eyed nymph, who, bowing to him reverentially, immediately presented it to him. He, as one frantic, placed the chaplet upon his brow, and, thus decorated, resumed his path; when he beheld (Indra) the husband of Sachi, the ruler of the three worlds, approach, seated on his infuriated elephant, Airávata, and attended by the gods. phrensied sage, taking from his head the garland of flowers, amidst which the bees collected ambrosia, threw it to the king of the gods, who caught it, and suspended it on the brow of Airávata, where it shone like the river Jáhnaví, glittering on the dark summit of the mountain Kailása.* The elephant, whose eyes were dim with inebriety, and attracted by the smell, took hold of the garland with his trunk, and cast it on the earth. That chief of sages, Durvásas, was highly incensed at this disrespectful treatment of his gift, and thus angrily addressed the sovereign of the immortals: "Inflated with the intoxication of power, Vásava, vile of spirit, thou art an idiot not to respect the garland I presented to thee, which was the dwelling of Fortune (Śrí). Thou hast not acknowledged it as a largess; thou hast not bowed thyself before me; thou hast not placed the wreath upon thy head, with thy countenance expanding with delight. Now, fool, for that thou hast not infinitely prized the garland that I gave thee, thy sovereignity over the three worlds shall be subverted. Thou confoundest me, Sakra, with other Brahmans; and hence I have suffered disrespect from thy arrogance. But, in like manner as thou hast cast the garland I gave thee down on the ground, so shall thy dominion over the universe be whelmed in ruin. Thou hast offended one whose wrath is dreaded by all created things, king of the gods, even me, by thine excessive pride."

Durvásas was the son of Atri by Anasúyá, and was an incarnation of a portion of Siva.

Descending hastily from his elephant, Mahendra endeavoured to appease the sinless Durvásas. But, to the excuses and prostrations of the thousand-eyed, the Muni answered: "I am not of a compassionate heart, nor is forgiveness congenial to my nature. Other Munis may relent; but know me, Śakra, to be Durvásas. Thou hast in vain been rendered insolent by Gautama and others; for know me, Indra, to be Durvásas, whose nature is a stranger to remorse. Thou hast been flattered by Vasishtha and other tender-hearted saints, whose loud praises have made thee so arrogant that thou hast insulted me.* But who is there in the universe that can behold my countenance, dark with frowns, and surrounded by my blazing hair, and not tremble? What need of words? I will not forgive, whatever semblance of humility thou mayest assume."

Having thus spoken, the Brahman went his way; and the king of the gods, remounting his elephant, returned to his capital, Amarávatí. Thenceforward, Maitreya, the three worlds and Śakra lost their vigour; and all vegetable products, plants, and herbs were withered and died; sacrifices were no longer offered; devout exercises no longer practised; men were no more addicted to charity, or any moral or religious obligation; all beings became devoid of steadiness; all the faculties of sense were obstructed by cupidity; and men's desires were excited by frivolous objects. Where there is energy there is prosperity; and upon prosperity energy depends. How can those abandoned by prosperity be possessed of energy? And without energy where is excellence? Without excellence there can be no vigour or heroism amongst men. He who has neither courage nor strength will be spurned by all; and he who is universally treated with disgrace must suffer abasement of his intellectual faculties.

The three regions being thus wholly divested of prosperity, and deprived of energy, the Dánavas and sons of Diti, the enemies of the gods, who were incapable of steadiness, and agitated by ambition, put forth their strength against the gods. They engaged in war with the feeble and unfortunate divinities; and Indra and the rest, being overcome in fight, fled, for refuge, to Brahmá, preceded by the god of flame (Hutásana). When the great father of the universe had heard all that had come to pass, he said to the deities: "Repair, for protection, to the god of high and low; the tamer of the demons; the causeless cause of creation, preservation, and destruction; the progenitor of the progenitors; the immortal unconquerable Vishnu: the cause of matter and spirit, of his unengendered products; the remover of the grief of all who humble themselves before him. thus spoken to the deities, Brahmá proceeded, along with them, to the northern shore of the sea of milk, and, with reverential words, thus prayed to the supreme Hari:—

May that purest of all pure spirits this day be propitious to us. May that Hari be propitious to us, whose inherent might is not an object of the progressive chain of moments, or of days, that make up time. May he who is called the supreme god, who is not in need of assistance, Hari, the soul of all embodied substance, be favourable unto us. Thus prayed to, the supreme deity, the mighty holder of the conch and discus, showed himself to them; and, beholding the lord of gods, bearing a shell, a discus, and a mace, the assemblage of primeval form, and radiant with embodied light, Pitámaha and the other deities, their eyes moistened with rapture, first paid him homage, and then thus addressed him: "Repeated salutation to thee, who art indefinable! Thou art Brahmá; thou art the wielder of the Pináka bow (Śiva); thou art Indra; thou art fire, air, the god of waters,† the sun,* the king of death (Yama), the Vasus, the Máruts (the winds), the Sádhyas, and Viśwadevas. This assembly of divinities, that now has come before thee, thou art; for, the creator of the world, thou art everywhere. Thou art the sacrifice, the prayer of oblation, the mystic syllable Om, the sovereign of all creatures. Thou art all that is to be known, or to be unknown. O universal soul, the whole world consists of thee. We, discomfited by the Daityas, have fled to thee, O Vishnu, for refuge. Spirit of all, have compassion upon us! Defend us with thy mighty power. There will be affliction, desire, trouble, and grief, until thy protection is obtained: but thou art the remover of all sins. Do thou, then, O pure of spirit, show favour unto us, who have fled to thee! O lord of all, protect us with thy great power, in union with the goddess who is thy strength."18 Hari, the creator of the universe, being thus prayed to by the prostrate divinities, smiled, and thus spake: "With renovated energy, O gods, I will restore your strength. Do you act as I enjoin. Let all the gods, associated with the Asuras, cast all sorts of medicinal herbs into the sea of milk; and then, taking the mountain Mandara for the churning-stick, the serpent Vásuki for the rope, churn the ocean together for ambrosia; depending upon my aid. To secure the assistance of the Daityas, you must be at peace with them, and engage to give them an equal portion of the fruit of your associated toil; promising them, that, by drinking the Amrita that shall be produced from the agitated ocean, they shall become mighty and immortal. I will take care that the enemies of the gods shall not partake of the precious draught; that they shall share in the labour alone."

Being thus instructed by the god of gods, the divinities entered into alliance with the demons: and they jointly undertook the acquirement of the beverage of immortality. They collected various kinds of medicinal herbs, and cast them into the sea of milk, the waters of which were radiant as the thin and shining clouds of autumn. They then took the mountain Mandara for the staff, the serpent Vásuki for the cord, and commenced to churn the ocean for the Amrita. The assembled gods were stationed, by Krishna, at the tail of the serpent; the Daityas and Dánavas, at its head and neck. Scorched by the flames emitted from his inflated hood, the demons were shorn of their glory; whilst the clouds, driven towards his tail by the breath of his mouth, refreshed the gods with revivifying showers. In the midst of the milky sea, Hari himself, in the form of a tortoise, served as a pivot for the mountain, as it was whirled around. The holder of the mace and discus was present, in other forms, amongst the gods and demons, and assisted to drag the monarch of the serpent race; and, in another vast body, he sat upon the summit of the mountain. With one portion of his energy, unseen by gods or demons, he sustained the serpent-king, and, with another, infused vigour into the gods.

From the ocean, thus churned by the gods and Dánavas, first uprose the cow Surabhi, the fountain of milk and curds, worshipped by the divinities, and beheld by them and their associates with minds disturbed and eyes glistening with delight. Then, as the holy Siddhas in the sky wondered what this could be, appeared the goddess Váruní (the deity of wine), her eyes rolling with intoxication. Next, from the whirlpool of the deep, sprang the celestial Párijáta tree, the delight of the nymphs of heaven; perfuming the world with its blossoms. The troop of Apsarasas (the nymphs of heaven), were then produced, of surprising loveliness, endowed with beauty and with taste. The cool-rayed moon next rose, and was seized by Mahádeva; and then poison was engendered from the sea, of which the snake-gods (Nágas) took possession. Dhanwantari, robed in white, and bearing in his hand the cup of Amrita, next came forth; beholding which, the sons of Diti and of Danu, as well as the Munis, were filled with satisfaction and delight. Then, seated on a fullblown lotos, and holding a water-lily in her hand, the goddess Śrí, radiant with beauty, rose from the waves. The great sages, enraptured, hymned her with the song dedicated to her praise.1* Viśwávasu and other heavenly quiristers sang, and Ghritáchí and other celestial nymphs danced before her. Gangá and other holy streams attended for her ablutions; and the elephants of the skies, taking up their pure waters in vases of gold, poured them over the goddess, the queen of the universal world. The sea of milk, in person, presented her with a wreath of never-fading flowers; and the artist of the gods (Viśwakarman) decorated her person with heavenly ornaments. Thus bathed attired, and adorned, the goddess, in the view of the celestials, cast herself upon the breast of Hari, and, there reclining, turned her eyes upon the deities, who were inspired with rapture by her gaze. Not so the Daityas, who, with Viprachitti at their head, were filled with indignation, as Vishnu turned away from them: and they were abandoned by the goddess of prosperity (Lakshmí).

The powerful and indignant Daityas then forcibly seized the Amrita-cup, that was in the hand of Dhanwantari. But Vishnu, assuming a female form, fascinated and deluded them, and, recovering the Amrita from them, delivered it to the gods. Sakra and the other deities quaffed the ambrosia. The incensed demons, grasping their weapons, fell upon them. But the gods, into whom the ambrosial draught had infused new vigour, defeated and put their host to flight; and they fled through the regions of space, and plunged into the subterraneous realms of Pátála. The gods thereat greatly rejoiced, did homage to the holder of the discus and mace, and resumed their reign in heaven. The sun shone with renovated splendour, and again discharged his appointed task; and the celestial luminaries again circled, O best of Munis, in their respective orbits. Fire once more blazed aloft, beautiful in splendour; and the minds of all beings were animated by devotion. The three worlds again were rendered happy by prosperity; and Indra, the chief of the gods, was restored to power. Seated upon his throne, and once more in

The churning of the ocean does not occur in several of the Puránas, and is but cursorily alluded to in the Siva, Linga, and Kúrma Puráńas. The Váyu and Padma have much the same narrative as that of our text; and so have the Agni and Bhágavata, except that they refer only briefly to the anger of Durvásas, without narrating the circumstances; indicating their being posterior, therefore, to the original tale. The part, however, assigned to Durvásas appears to be an embellishment added to the original; for no mention of him occurs in the Matsya Purána or even in the Hari Vamsa. Neither does it occur in what may be considered the oldest extant versions of the story, those of the Rámáyana and Mahábhárata. Both these ascribe the occurrence to the desire of the gods and Daityas to become immortal. The Matsya assigns a similar motive to the gods, instigated by observing that the Daityas slain by them in battle were restored to life, by Śukra, with the Sanjíviní or herb of immortality, which he had discovered. The account in the Hari Vamsa is brief and obscure, and is explained, by the commentator, as an allegory, in which the churning of the ocean typifies ascetic penance, and the ambrosia is final liberation. But this is mere mystification. The legend of the Rámáyana is translated, Vol. I., p. 410, of the Serampore edition, and that of the Mahábhárata, by Sir C. Wilkins, in the notes to his translation of the Bhagavad Gita. See, also, the original text, Calcutta edition, p. 40. It has been presented to general readers, in a more attractive form, by my friend. H. M. Parker, in his Draught of Immortality, printed, with other poems, London, 1827. The Matsya Purána has many of the stanzas of the Mahábhárata interspersed with others. There is some variety in the order and number of articles produced from heaven, exercising sovereignty over the gods, Sakra thus eulogized the goddess who bears a lotos in her hand:

the ocean. As I have observed elsewhere (Hindu Theatre, Vol. I., p. 59, London edition), the popular enumeration is fourteen. But the Rámáyana specifies but nine; the Mahábhárata, nine; the Bhágavata, ten; the Padma, nine; the Váyu, twelve: the Matsva, perhaps, gives the whole number. Those in which most agree are: 1. the Hálahála or Kálakúťa poison, swallowed by Śiva: 2. Váruní or Surá, the goddess of wine, who being taken by the gods, and rejected by the Daityas, the former were termed Suras. and the latter, Asuras; 3. the horse Uchchaihsravas, taken by Indra: 4. Kaustubha, the jewel worn by Vishnu; 5. the moon: 6. Dhanwantari, with the Amrita in his Kamandalu or vase: and these two articles are, in the Váyu, considered as distinct products: 7. the goddess Padmá or Śri; 8. the Apsarasas or nymphs of heaven; 9. Surabhi or the cow of plenty; 10. the Párijáta tree or tree of heaven; 11. Airávata, the elephant taken by Indra. The Matsya adds: 12. the umbrella taken by Varuna; 13. the ear-rings taken by Indra, and given to Aditi; and, apparently, another horse, the white horse of the sun. Or the number may be completed by counting the Amrita separately from Dhanwantari. The number is made up, in the popular lists, by adding the bow and the conch of Vishnu. But there does not seem to be any good authority for this; and the addition is a sectarial one. So is that of the Tulasi tree, a plant sacred to Křishňa, which is one of the twelve specified by the Váyu Purána. The Uttara Khanda of the Padma Purána has a peculiar enumeration, or: Poison; Jyeshtha or Alakshmi, the goddess of misfortune, the elder born to fortune; the goddess of wine; Nidrá or sloth; the Apsarasas; the elephant of Indra; Lakshmi; the moon; and the Tulasi plant. The reference to Mohini, the female form assumed by Vishnu, is very brief in our text; and no notice is taken of the story told in the Mahábhárata and some of the Puranas, of the Daitya Rahu's insinuating himself amongst

"I bow down to Śrí, the mother of all beings, seated on her lotos-throne, with eyes like full-blown lotoses, reclining on the breast of Vishńu. Thou, beautiful goddess, art knowledge of devotion, great knowledge, mystic knowledge, and spiritual knowledge, "which confers eternal liberation. Thou art the science of reasoning, "the three Vedas, the arts and sciences; thou art moral and political science. † The world is peopled, by thee, with pleasing or displeasing forms. Who else than thou, O goddess, is seated on that person of the god of gods, the wielder of the mace, which is made up of sacrifice, and contemplated by holy ascetics? Abandoned by thee, the three worlds were on the brink of ruin: but they have been reanimated by thee. From thy propitious gaze, O mighty goddess, men obtain wives, children, dwellings, friends, harvests, wealth. Health and strength, power, victory, happiness are easy of attainment to those upon whom thou smilest. Thou art the mother of all beings; as the god of gods, Hari, is their father: and this world, whether animate or inanimate, is pervaded by thee and Vishnu. O thou who purifiest all things, forsake not our treasures, our granaries, our dwellings, our dependants, our persons, our wives. Abandon not our children, our friends, our lineage, our jewels, O thou who abidest on the bosom of the god of gods. They whom thou desertest are forsaken by truth, by purity, and goodness, by every amiable and excellent quality; whilst the base and worthless upon whom thou lookest favourably become immediately endowed with all excellent qualifications, with families. and with power. He on whom thy countenance is turned is honourable, amiable, prosperous, wise, and of exalted birth, a hero of irresistible prowess. But all his merits and his advantages are converted into worthlessness, from whom, beloved of Vishnu, mother of the world, thou avertest thy face. The tongues of Brahmá are unequal to celebrate thy excellence. Be propitious to me, O goddess, lotos-eyed; and never forsake me more."

the gods, and obtaining a portion of the Amrita. Being beheaded, for this, by Vishńu, the head became immortal, in consequence of the Amrita having reached the throat, and was transferred, as a constellation, to the skies: and, as the sun and moon detected his presence amongst the gods, Ráhu pursues them, with implacable hatred, and his efforts to seize them are the causes of eclipses; Ráhu typifying the ascending and descending nodes. This seems to be the simplest and oldest form of the legend. The equal immortality of the body, under the name Ketu, and his being the cause of meteorical phenomena, seems to have been an afterthought. In the Padma and Bhágavata, Ráhu and Ketu are the sons of Simhiká, the wife of the Dánava Viprachitti.

Being thus praised, the gratified Srí, abiding in all creatures, and heard by all beings, replied to the god of a hundred rites (Satakratu): "I am pleased, monarch of the gods, by thine adoration. Demand from me what thou desirest. I have come to fulfil thy wishes." "If, goddess", replied Indra, "thou wilt grant my prayers; if I am worthy of thy bounty; be this my first request,-that the three worlds may never again be deprived of thy presence. My second supplication, daughter of Ocean, is, that thou wilt not forsake him who shall celebrate thy praises in the words I have addressed to thee." "I will not abandon", the goddess answered, "the three worlds again. This thy first boon is granted: for I am gratified by thy praises. And, further, I will never turn my face away from that mortal who, morning and evening, shall repeat the hymn with which thou hast addressed me."

Parásara proceeded.—Thus, Maitreya, in former times the goddess Śrí conferred these boons upon the king of the gods, being pleased by his adorations. But her first birth was the daughter of Bhrigu by Khyáti. It was at a subsequent period that she was produced from the sea, at the churning of the ocean, by the demons and the gods, to obtain ambrosia. For, in like manner as the lord of the world, the god of gods, Janárdana, descends amongst mankind (in various shapes), so does his coadjutrix Śrí. Thus, when Hari was born as a dwarf, the son of Aditi, Lakshmi appeared from a lotos (as Padmá or Kamalá). When he was born as Ráma, of the race of Bhrigu (or Parasuráma), she was Dharaní. When he was Rághava (Rámachandra), she was Sítá. And, when he was Kŕishňa, she became Rukmińí. In the other descents of Vishńu, she is his associate. If he takes a celestial form, she appears as divine; if a mortal, she becomes a mortal, too; transforming her own person agreeably to whatever character it pleases Vishnu to put on. Whosoever hears this account of the birth of Lakshmi, whosoever reads it, shall never lose the goddess Fortune from his dwelling, for three generations; and misfortune, the fountain of strife, shall never enter into those houses in which the hymns to Sri are repeated.

Thus, Brahman, have I narrated to thee, in answer to thy question, how Lakshmí, formerly the daughter of Bhrigu, sprang from the sea of milk. And misfortune shall never visit those amongst mankind who daily recite the praises of Lakshmí, uttered by Indra, which are the origin and cause of all prosperity.

Bhrigu, he cursed Vishnu to be born upon earth ten times, to be separated from his wife, and to have no children. The legend is an insipid modern embellishment.

CHAPTER X.

The descendants of the daughters of Daksha married to the Rishis.

MAITREYA.—Thou hast narrated to me, great Muni, all that I asked of thee. Now resume the account of the creation subsequently to Bhrigu.

Paráśara.—Lakshmí, the bride of Vishňu, was the daughter of Bhŕigu by Khyáti. They had also two sons, Dhátŕi and Vidhátŕi, who married the two daughters of the illustrious Meru, Áyati and Niyati, and had, by them, each, a son, named Práńa and Mŕikańda.* The son of the latter was Márkańdeya, from whom Vedaśiras was born.¹ The son of Práńa was named Dyuti-

The Linga, the Váyu, and Márkańdeya, however, confirm our reading of the text; making Vedaśiras the son of Márkańdeya. Práńa, or, as read in the two former, Páńdu, was married to Puńdaríká, and had, by her, Dyutimat, whose sons were Sŕijavána and Aśruta or Aśrutavrańa. Mŕikańda (also read Míikańdu) married Manaswiní, and had Márkańdeya, whose son, by Múrdhanyá, was Vedaśiras. He married Pívarí, and had many children, who constituted the family or Brahmanical tribe of the Bhárgavas, sons of Bhŕigu. The most celebrated of these was Ušanas, the preceptor of the Daityas, who, according to the Bhárgavata, was the son of Vedaśiras. But the Váyu makes him the son of Bhŕigu by Paulomí, and born at a different period.

mat; and his son was Rájavat; after whom the race of Bhrigu became infinitely multiplied.

Sambhúti, the wife of Maríchi, gave birth to Paurnamása, whose sons were Virajas and Sarvaga. I shall hereafter notice his other descendants, when I give a more particular account of the race of Maríchi. 1

The wife of Angiras, Smriti, bore daughters named Siníválí, Kuhú, Ráká, and Anumati (phases of the moon).² Anasúyá, the wife of Atri, was the mother

¹ Alluding especially to Kaśyapa, the son of Maríchi, of whose posterity a full detail is subsequently given. The Bhágavata adds a daughter, Devakulyá; and the Váyu and Linga, four daughters, Tushti, Pushti, Twishá, and Apachiti. The latter inserts the grandsons of Paurńamása. Virajas, married to Gaurí, has Sudháman, a Lokapála, or ruler of the east quarter; and Parvasa (quasi Sarvaga) has, by Parvasá, Yajnaváma and Kaśyata, * who were, both, founders of Gotras or families. † The names of all these occur in different forms ‡ in different MSS.

² The Bhágavata adds, that, in the Swárochisha Manwantara,

† The words of the Váyu-purána, in the MSS. within my reach, are:

पर्वसः सर्वगणानां प्रविष्यः स महायगाः। पर्वसः पर्वसायां तु जनयामास व सुतौ ॥ यज्ञवामं च श्रीमन्तं सुतं काग्रापमेव च। तथोगींचकरौ प्रची ती जाती धर्मनिश्वितौ॥

The first line of this quotation is, in some MSS. that I have seen, पर्वसः सर्वगणानासविष्यः &c.; and one MS. has, instead of प्रविष्यः, प्रविष्यः. All those MSS. have स महायगाः, or स सहायगः. But, without conjectural mending, the line in question yields no sense. Professor Wilson's "quasi Sarvaga" seems to imply that the MS., or MSS., which he followed had some such lection as सर्वेग द्व-

of three sinless sons: Soma (the moon), Durvásas, and the ascetic* Dattátreya.¹ Pulastya had, by Príti, a son, called, in a former birth, or in the Swáyambhuva Manwantara, Dattoli,† who is now known as the sage Agastya.² Kshamá, the wife of the patriarch Pulaha, was the mother of three sons: Karmaśa,‡ Arvarívat,§ the sages Utathya and Břihaspati were also sons of Angiras; and the Váyu, &c. specify Agni and Kírttimat as the sons of the patriarch, in the first Manwantara. Agni, married to Sadwatí, has Parjanya, married to Máríchí; and their son is Hirańyaroman, a Lokapála. Kírttimat has, by Dhenuká, two sons, Charishńu and Dhřitimat.

² The text would seem to imply that he was called Agastya in a former Manwantara: but the commentator explains it as above. The Bhágavata calls the wife of Pulastya, Havirbhú, whose sons were the Muni Agastya, called, in a former birth, Dahrágni (or Jatharágni) and Viśravas. The latter had, by Idavidá, the deity of wealth, Kubera, and, by Keśini, the Rákshasas Rávańa, Kumbhakarńa, and Vibhíshana. The Váyu and Sahishńu.¹ The wife of Kratu, Samnati, brought forth the sixty thousand Valikhilyas, pigmy sages,* no bigger than a joint of the thumb, chaste, pious, resplendent as the rays of the sun.² Vasishtha had seven sons, by his wife Úrjá: Rajas, Gátra, Úrdhwabáhu, Savana,† Anagha, Sutapas, and Śukra, the seven pure sages.³ The Agni named Abhímánin, who is the eldest specifies three sons of Pulastya,—Dattoli, Vedabáhu,‡ and Viníta, and one daughter, Sadwatí, married (see p. 153, note 2) to Agni.

² The different authorities agree in this place. The Váyu adds two daughters, Punyá and Sumati, married to Yajnaváma (see p. 153, note 1).

³ The Bhágavata has an entirely different set of names, or: Chitraketu, Surochis, Virajas, Mitra, Ulbańa, Vasubhŕidyána, and Dyumat. It also specifies Śaktri and others, as the issue of a different marriage. The Váyu and Linga have the same sons as in our text; reading Putra and Hasta, in place of Gátra. They add a daughter, Puńdaríká, married to Páńdu (see p. 152, note). The eldest son, according to the Váyu, espoused a daughter of Márkańdeya, and had, by her, the Lokapála of the west, Ketumat. The seven sons of Vasishíha are termed, in the text, the seven Rishis; appearing, in that character, in the third Manwantara.

born of Brahmá, had, by Swáhá, three sons of surpassing brilliancy: Pávaka, Pavamána, and Śuchi, who drinks up water. They had forty-five sons, who, with the original son of Brahmá, and his three descendants, constitute the forty-nine fires. The progenitors (Pitris), who, as I have mentioned, were created by Brahmá, were the Agnishwáttas and Barhishads; the former being devoid of, and the latter possessed of, fires. By explained, by the commentator; वैद्वि कर्मण यज्ञे येषां नामभि-रिपिदेवताका इष्टयो निष्ट्यने क्रियने त एते उपयो न लीकिकाः।

¹ The eldest son of Brahmá, according to the commentator, upon the authority of the Vedas: ऋषण्याधारण्यो मुदाद्धिर्जायति सुते: ¡ The Váyu Puráña enters into a very long detail of the names and places of the whole forty-nine fires. According to that, also, Pávaka is electric or Vaidyuta fire; Pavamána is that produced by friction, or Nirmathya; and Śuchi is solar (Saura) fire. Pavamána was the parent of Kavyaváhana, the fire of the Pitŕis; Śuchi, of Havyaváhana, the fire of the gods; and Pavamána, of Saharaksha, the fire of the Asuras. The Bhágavata explains these different fires to be so many appellations of fire employed in the invocations with which different oblations to fire are offered in the ritual of the Vedas:

² According to the commentator, this distinction is derived from the Vedas. The first class, or Agnishwáttas, consists of those householders who, when alive, did not maintain their domestic fires, nor offer burnt-sacrifices; the second, of those who kept up the household flame, and presented oblations with fire. Manut calls these Agnidagdhas and the reverse, which Sir William Jones renders 'consumable by fire', &c. Kullúka Bhatta gives no explanation of them. The Bhágavata adds other classes of them Swadhá had two daughters, Mená and Dháriní, who were, both, acquainted with theological truth, and both addicted to religious meditation, both accomplished in perfect wisdom, and adorned with all estimable qualities. Thus has been explained the progeny of the daughters of Daksha. He who, with faith, recapitulates the account shall never want offspring.

Pitris; or, the Ajyapas, 'drinkers of ghee', and Somapas, 'drinkers of the acid juice.' The commentator, explaining the meaning of the terms Sagni and Anagni, has: येषामयी करणमस्त ते साययः। तद्र हितास्त्वगयः। which might be understood to signify that the Pitris who are 'without fire' are those to whom oblations are not offered, and those 'with fire' are they to whom oblations are presented.

The Váyu carries this genealogy forward. Dháriní was married to Meru, and had, by him, Mandara and three daughters, Niyati, Áyati, and Velá. The two first were married to Dhátri and Vidhátri (p. 152). Velá was the wife of Samudra, by whom she had Sámudrí, married to Práchínabarhis, and the mother of the ten Prachetasas, the fathers of Daksha, as subsequently narrated. Mená was married to Himavat, and was the mother of Maináka, and of Gangá, and of Párvatí or Umá.

² No notice is here taken of Satí, married to Bhava, as is intimated in c. 8 (pp. 117, 118), when describing the Rudras. Of these genealogies the fullest and, apparently, the oldest account is given in the Váyu Purána. As far as that of our text extends, the two nearly agree; allowing for differences of appellation, originating in inaccurate transcription; the names frequently varying in different copies of the same work, leaving it doubtful which reading should be preferred. The Bhágavata, as observed above (p. 109 note 3), has created some further perplexity by substituting, as the wives of the patriarchs, the daughters of Kardama, for those of Daksha. Of the general statement it may be observed, that, although, in some respects, allegorical, as in the names of the wives of the Rishis (p. 109), and, in others, astronomical, as in the denominations of the daughters of Angiras (p. 153), yet it seems probable that it is not altogether fabulous, but that the persons, in some instances, had a real existence; the genealogies originating in imperfectly preserved traditions of the families of the first teachers of the Hindu religion, and of the descent of individuals who took an active share in its propagation.

CHAPTER XI.

Legend of Dhruya, the son of Uttánapáda: he is unkindly treated by his father's second wife: applies to his mother: her advice: he resolves to engage in religious exercises: sees the seven Kishis, who recommend him to propitiate Vishúu.

Parásara continued.—I mentioned to you that the Manu Swáyambhuva had two heroic and pious sons, Privavrata and Uttánapáda. Of these two the latter had a son, whom he dearly loved, Uttama, by his favourite wife, Suruchi. By his queen, named Suníti, to whom he was less attached, he also had a son, called Dhruva. 1 Observing his brother Uttama on the lap of his father, as he was seated upon his throne, Dhruva was desirous of ascending to the same place; but, as Suruchi was present, the Raja did not gratify the desire of his son, respectfully wishing to be taken on his father's knee. Beholding the child of her rival thus anxious to be placed on his father's lap, and her own son already seated there, Suruchi thus addressed the boy: "Why, child, do you vainly indulge in such presumptuous hopes? You are born from a different mother, and are no son of mine, that you should aspire inconsiderately to a station fit for the excelleut Uttama alone. It is true you are the son of the Raja: but I have not given you birth. This regal throne, the seat of the king of kings, is suited to my son only. Why should you aspire to its occupation? Why idly cherish such lofty ambition, as if you were my son? Do you forget that you are but the offspring of Suníti?"

The boy, having heard the speech of his step-mother, quitted his father, and repaired, in a passion, to the apartment of his own mother; who, beholding him vexed, took him upon her lap, and, gently smiling, asked him what was the cause of his anger, who had displeased him, and if any one, forgetting the respect due to his father, had behaved ill to him. Dhruva, in reply, repeated to her all that the arrogant Suruchi had said to him, in the presence of the king. Deeply distressed by the narrative of the boy, the humble Suníti, her eyes dimmed with tears, sighed, and said: "Suruchi has rightly spoken. Thine, child, is an unhappy fate. Those who are born to fortune are not liable to the insults of their rivals. Yet be not afflicted, my child. For who shall efface what thou hast formerly done, or shall assign to thee what thou hast left undone? The regal throne, the umbrella of royalty, horses, and elephants are his whose virtues have deserved them. Remember this, my son, and be consoled. That the king favours Suruchi is the reward of her merits in a former existence. The name of wife alone belongs to such as I, who have not equal merit. Her son is the progeny of accumulated piety, and is born as Uttama. Mine has been born as Dhruva, of inferior moral worth. Therefore, my son, it is not proper for you to grieve. A wise man will be contented with that degree which appertains to him. But, if you continue to feel hurt at the words of Suruchi, endeavour to augment that religious merit which bestows all good. Be amiable; be pious; be friendly; be assiduous in benevolence to all living creatures. For prosperity descends upon modest worth, as water flows towards low ground."

Dhruva answered: "Mother, the words that you have addressed to me, for my consolation, find no place in a heart that contumely has broken. I will exert myself to obtain such elevated rank, that it shall be revered by the whole world. Though I be not born of Suruchi, the beloved of the king, you shall behold my glory, who am your son. Let Uttama, my brother, her child, possess the throne given to him by my father. I wish for no other honours than such as my own actions shall acquire, such as even my father has not

Having thus spoken, Dhruva went forth from his mother's dwelling. He quitted the city, and entered an adjoining thicket, where he beheld seven Munis, sitting upon hides of the black antelope, which they had taken from off their persons, and spread over the holy Kuśa grass. Saluting them reverentially, and bowing humbly before them, the prince said: "Behold, in me, venerable men, the son of Uttánapáda, born of Suníti. Dissatisfied with the world, I appear before you." The Rishis replied: "The son of a king, and but four or five years of age, there can be no reason, child, why you should be dissatisfied with life. You cannot be in want of anything, whilst the king, your father, reigns. We cannot imagine that you suffer the pain of separation from the object of your affections; nor do we observe, in your person, any sign of disease. What is the cause of your discontent? Tell us, if it is known to yourself."

Dhruva then repeated to the Kishis what Suruchi had spoken to him; and, when they had heard his story, they said to one another: "How surprising is the vehemence of the Kshatriya nature, that resentment is cherished even by a child, and he cannot efface from his mind the harsh speeches of a step-mother! Son of a Kshatriya, tell us, if it be agreeable to thee, what thou hast proposed, through dissatisfaction with the world, to accomplish. If thou wishest our aid in what thou hast to do, declare it freely: for we perceive that thou art desirous to speak."

Dhruva said: "Excellent sages, I wish not for riches; neither do I want dominion. I aspire to such a station as no one before me has attained. Tell me what I must do, to effect this object; how I may reach an elevation superior to all other dignities." (The Rishis severally thus replied.) Maríchi said: "The best of stations is not within the reach of men who fail to propitiate Govinda. Do thou, prince, worship the undecaying (Achyuta)." Atri said: "He with whom the first of spirits, Janárdana, is pleased, obtains imperishable dignity. I declare unto you the truth." Angiras said: "If you desire an exalted station, worship that Govinda in whom, immutable and undecaying, all that is exists." Pulastya said: "He who adores the divine Hari, the supreme soul, supreme glory, who is the supreme Brahma, obtains what is difficult of attainment, eternal liberation." "When that Janárdana", observed Kratu. "who, in sacrifices, is the soul of sacrifice, and who, in abstract contemplation, is supreme spirit,* is pleased, there is nothing man may not acquire." Pulaha said: "Indra, having worshipped the lord of the world, obtained the dignity of king of the celestials. Do thou adore, pious youth, that Vishńu, the lord of sacrifice." "Anything, child, that the mind covets", exclaimed Vasishtha, "may be obtained by propitiating Vishńu,—even though it be the station that is the most excellent in the three worlds."

Dhruva replied to them: "You have told me, humbly bending before you, what deity is to be propitiated. Now inform me what prayer is to be meditated by me, that will offer him gratification. May the great Rishis, looking upon me with favour, instruct me how I am to propitiate the god." The Rishis answered: "Prince, thou deservest to hear how the adoration of Vishnu has been performed by those who have been devoted to his service. The mind must first be made to forsake all external impressions; and a man must then fix it steadily on that being in whom the world is. By him whose thoughts are thus concentrated on one only object, and wholly filled by it; whose spirit is firmly under control; the prayer that we shall repeat to thee is to be inaudibly recited: 'Om! Glory to Vásudeva, whose essence is divine wisdom; whose form is in-

¹ The instructions of the Rishis amount to the performance of the Yoga. External impressions are, first, to be obviated by particular positions, modes of breathing, &c. The mind must then be fixed on the object of meditation: this is Dhárana. Next comes the meditation or Dhyána; and then the Japa or inaudible repetition of a Mantra or short prayer: as in the text. The subject of the Yoga is more fully detailed in a subsequent book.

CHAPTER XII.

Dhruva commences a course of religious austerities. Unsuccessful attempts of Indra and his ministers to distract Dhruva's attention: they appeal to Vishńu, who allays their fears, and appears to Dhruva. Dhruva praises Vishńu, and is raised to the skies, as the pole-star.

THE prince, having received these instructions, respectfully saluted the sages, and departed from the forest, fully confiding in the accomplishment of his purposes. He repaired to the holy place, on the banks of the Yamuna, called Madhu or Madhuvana, (the grove of Madhu), after the demon of that name, who formerly abided there. Satrughna (the younger brother of Ráma) having slain the Rákshasa Lavana, the son of Madhu, founded a city on the spot, which was named Mathurá. At this holy shrine—the purifier from all sin, which enjoyed the presence of the sanctifying god of gods-Dhruva performed penance, as enjoined by Maríchi and the sages. He contemplated Vishnu, the sovereign of all the gods, seated in himself. Whilst his mind was wholly absorbed in meditation, the mighty Hari, identical with all beings and with all natures, (took possession of his heart). Vishnu being thus present in his mind, the earth, the supporter of elemental life, could not sustain the weight of the ascetic. As he stood upon his left foot, one hemisphere bent beneath him; and, when he stood upon his right, the other half of the earth sank down. When he touched the earth with his toes, it shook, with all its mountains; and the rivers and the seas were troubled; and the gods partook of the universal agitation.

The celestials called Yamas, being excessively alarmed, then took counsel with Indra, how they should interrupt the devout exercises of Dhruva; and the divine beings termed Kushmáńdas, in company with their king, commenced anxious efforts to distract his meditations. One, assuming the semblance of his mother, Suníti, stood weeping before him, and calling in tender accents: "My son, my son, desist from destroying thy strength by this fearful penance. I have gained thee, my son, after much anxious hope. Thou canst not have the cruelty to quit me, helpless, alone, and unprotected, on account of the unkindness of my rival. Thou art my only refuge. I have no hope but thou. What hast thou, a child but five years old, to do with rigorous penance? Desist from such fearful practices, that yield no beneficial fruit. First comes the season of youthful pastime; and, when that is over, it is the time for study. Then succeeds the period of worldly enjoyment; and, lastly, that of austere devotion. This is thy season of pastime, my child. Hast thou engaged in these practices to put an end to thine existence? Thy chief duty is love for me. Duties are according to time of life. Lose not thyself in bewildering error. Desist from such unrighteous actions. If not, if thou wilt not desist from these austerities, I will terminate my life before thee."

But Dhruva, being wholly intent on seeing Vishńu, beheld not his mother weeping in his presence, and calling upon him; and the illusion, crying out, "Fly, fly, my child: the hideous spirits of ill are crowding into this dreadful forest, with uplifted weapons", quickly disappeared. Then advanced frightful Rákshasas, wielding terrible arms, and with countenances emitting fiery flame; and nocturnal fiends thronged around the prince, uttering fearful noises, and whirling and tossing their threatening weapons. Hundreds of jackals, from whose mouths gushed flame,1 as they devoured their prey, were howling aloud, to appal the boy, wholly engrossed by meditation. The goblins called out: "Kill him, kill him; cut him to pieces; eat him, eat him." And monsters, with the faces of lions and camels and crocodiles, roared and yelled, with horrible cries, to terrify the prince. But all these uncouth spectres, appalling cries, and threatening weapons made no impression upon his senses, whose mind was completely intent on Govinda. The son of the monarch of the earth, engrossed by one only idea, beheld, uninterruptedly, Vishnu seated in his soul, and saw no other object.

All their delusive stratagems being thus foiled, the gods were more perplexed than ever. Alarmed at their discomfiture, and afflicted by the devotions of the boy, they assembled, and repaired, for succour, to Hari, the origin of the world, who is without beginning or end, and thus addressed him: "God of gods, sovereign of the world, god supreme, and infinite spirit," distressed by the austerities of Dhruva, we have come to thee for protection. As the moon increases in his orb day by day, so this youth advances incessantly towards superhuman power, by his devotions. Terrified by the ascetic practices of the son of Uttánapáda, we have come to thee for succour. Do thou allay the fervour of his meditations. We know not to what station he aspires-to the throne of Indra, the regency of the solar or lunar sphere, or to the sovereignty of riches or of the deep. Have compassion on us, lord: remove this affliction from our breasts. Divert the son of Uttánapáda from persevering in his penance." Vishnu replied to the gods: "The lad desireth neither the rank of Indra, nor the solar orb, nor the sovereignty of wealth or of the ocean. All that he solicits I will grant. Return, therefore, deities, to your mansions, as ye list; and, be no more alarmed. I will put an end to the penance of the boy, whose mind is immersed in deep contemplation."

The gods, being thus pacified by the supreme, saluted him respectfully, and retired, and, preceded by Indra, returned to their habitations. But Hari, who is all things, assuming a shape with four arms, proceeded to Dhruva, being pleased with his identity of nature, and thus addressed him: "Son of Uttánapáda, be prosperous. Contented with thy devotions, I, the giver of boons, am present. Demand what boon thou desirest. In that thou hast wholly disregarded external objects, and fixed thy thoughts on me, I am well pleased with thee. Ask, therefore, a suitable reward." The boy, hearing these words of the god of gods, opened his eyes, and, beholding that Hari, whom he had before seen in his meditations, actually in his presence, bearing, in his hands, the shell, the discus, the mace, the bow, and scimetar, and crowned with a diadem, he bowed his head down to earth: the hair stood erect on his brow, and his heart was depressed with awe. He reflected how best he should offer thanks to the god of gods, what he could say in his adoration, what words were capable of expressing his praise; and, being overwhelmed with perplexity, he had recourse, for consolation, to the deity. "If", he exclaimed, "the lord is contented with my devotions, let this be my reward,-that I may know how to praise him as I wish. How can I, a child, pronounce his praises, whose abode is unknown to Brahmá and to others learned in the Vedas? My heart is overflowing with devotion to thee. O lord, grant me the faculty worthily to lay mine adorations at thy feet."

Whilst lowly bowing, with his hands uplifted to his forehead, Govinda, the lord of the world, touched the son of Uttánapáda with the tip of his conch-shell. And immediately the royal youth, with a countenance sparkling with delight, praised respectfully the imperishable protector of living beings. "I venerate", exclaimed Dhruva, "him whose forms are earth, water, fire, air, ether, mind, intellect, the first element* (Ahamkara), primeval nature, and the pure, subtile, all-pervading soul, that surpasses nature. sacrifice derived, and all oblations, and curds, and ghee, and animals of either class (domestic or wild). From thee the Rig-veda, the Saman, the metres (of the Vedas), and the Yajur-veda are born. Horses, and cows having teeth in one jaw only;1 proceed from thee; and from thee come goats, sheep, deer. Brahmans sprang from thy mouth; warriors, from thy arms; Vaisyas, from thy thighs; and Súdras, from thy feet. From thine eyes come the sun; from thine ears, the wind; and, from thy mind, the moon; the vital airs, from thy central vein; and fire, from thy mouth; the sky, from thy navel; and heaven, from thy head; the regions, from thine ears; the earth, from thy feet. All this world was derived from thee. As the wide-spreading Nyagrodha (Indian fig) tree is compressed in a small seed, 2 so, at the time of dissolution,* the whole universe is comprehended in thee, as its germ. As the Nyagrodha germinates from the seed, and becomes, first, a shoot, and then rises into loftiness, so the created world proceeds from thee, and expands into magnitude. As the bark and leaves of the plantain-tree are to be seen in its stem, so thou art the stem of the universe; and all things are visible in thee. The faculties of the intellect, that are the cause of pleasure and of pain, abide in

Salutation to thee, the subtile rudiment, which, being single, becomes manifold. Salutation to thee, soul of existent things, identical with the great elements. Thou, imperishable, art beheld, in spiritual knowledge, as perceptible objects, as nature, as spirit, as the world, as Brahmá, as Manu, by internal contemplation. But thou art in all, the element of all: thou art all, assuming every form: all is from thee; and thou art from thyself. I salute thee, universal soul. Glory be to thee! Thou art one with all things. O lord of all, thou art present

In life, or living beings, perception depends not, according to Hindu metaphysics, upon the external senses; but the impressions made upon them are communicated to the mental organ or sense, and by the mind to the understanding—Samvid (संविद्र) in the text—by which they are distinguished as pleasurable, painful, or mixed. But pleasure depends upon the quality of goodness; pain, on that of darkness; and their mixture, on that of foulness, inherent in the understanding: properties belonging to Jíveswara, or god as one with life, or to embodied spirit, but not as Parameśwara or supreme spirit.

"Thou art regarded, in mental action, as the evolved, as pradhána, as spirit; as viráj, samráj, and swaráj; as, among souls, the imperishable soul."

For pradhána, the same as prakřiti, see my first note in p. 18, and the first in p. 20, supra. It is ahańkára, &c. that is meant by "the evolved", viz., pradhána. Pradhána, unqualified, is here to be taken as unevolved. Viráj, samráj, and swaráj are well-known technicalities of the Vedánta philosophy.

The Supreme, under various aspects, is described in this couplet.

in all things. What can I say unto thee? Thou knowest all that is in the heart, O soul of all, sovereign lord of all creatures, origin of all things. Thou, who art all beings, knowest the desires of all creatures. The desire that I cherished has been gratified, lord, by thee. My devotions have been crowned with success, in that I have seen thee."

Vishnu said to Dhruva: "The object of thy devotions has, in truth, been attained, in that thou hast seen me: for the sight of me, young prince, is never unproductive. Ask, therefore, of me what boon thou desirest: for men in whose sight I appear obtain all their wishes." To this, Dhruya answered: "Lord god of all creatures, who abidest in the hearts of all, how should the wish that I cherish be unknown to thee? I will confess unto thee the hope that my presumptuous heart has entertained; a hope that it would be difficult to gratify, but that nothing is difficult, when thou, creator of the world, art pleased. Through thy favour, Indra* reigns over the three worlds. The sister-queen of my mother has said to me, loudly and arrogantly: 'The royal throne is not for one who is not born of me': and I now solicit of the support of the universe an exalted station, superior to all others, and one that shall endure for ever." Vishnu said to him: "The station that thou askest thou shalt obtain: for I was satisfied with thee, of old, in a prior existence. Thou wast, formerly, a Brahman, whose thoughts were ever devoted to me, ever dutiful to thy parents, and observant of thy duties. In course of time, a prince became thy friend, who was in the period of youth, indulged in all sensual pleasures, and was of handsome appearance and elegant form. Beholding, in consequence of associating with him, his affluence, you formed the desire that you might be subsequently born as the son of a king; and, according to your wish, you obtained a princely birth, in the illustrious mansion of Uttánapáda. But that which would have been thought a great boon by others, birth in the race of Swayambhuva, you have not so considered, and, therefore, have propitiated me. The man who worships me obtains speedy liberation from life. What is heaven to one whose mind is fixed on me? A station shall be assigned to thee, Dhruva, above the three worlds; 1 one in which thou shalt sustain the stars and the planets; a station above those of the sun, the moon. Mars, the son of Soma (Mercury), Venus, the son of Súrya (Saturn), and all the other constellations; above the regions of the seven Rishis and the divinities suggests some suspicion of an original identity. In neither of the authorities have we, perhaps, the primitive fable. It is evident, from the quotation, that presently follows in the text, of a stanza by Uśanas, that the Purána has not the oldest version of the legend; and Ovid's representation of it is after a fashion of his own. All that has been retained of the original is the conformity of the characters and of the main incident, the translation of a mother and her son to the heavens, as constellations, in which the pole-star is the most conspicuous luminary.

who traverse the atmosphere. Some celestial beings endure for four ages; some, for the reign of a Manu. To thee shall be granted the duration of a Kalpa. Thy mother, Suniti, in the orb of a bright star, shall abide near thee for a similar term; and all those who, with minds attentive, shall glorify thee at dawn, or at eventide, shall acquire exceeding religious merit.

Thus, the sage Dhruva, having received a boon from Janárdana, the god of gods, and lord of the world, resides in an exalted station. Beholding his glory, Usanas, the preceptor of the gods and demons, repeated these verses: "Wonderful is the efficacy of this penance. marvellous is its reward, that the seven Rishis should be preceded by Dhruva. This, too, is the pious Suníti, his parent, who is called Súnritá."2 Who can celebrate her greatness, who, having given birth to Dhruva, has become the asylum of the three worlds, enjoying, to all future time, an elevated station, a station eminent above all? He who shall worthily describe the ascent into the sky of Dhruva, for ever shall be freed from all sin, and enjoy the heaven of Indra. Whatever be his dignity, whether upon earth, or in heaven, he shall never fall from it, but shall long enjoy life, possessed of every blessing.3

(Swarga Khańda), Agni, and Náradíya, much to the same purport, and partly in the same words, as our text. The Brahma, and its double, the Hari Vamśa, the Matsya, and Váyu, merely allude to Dhruva's having been transferred, by Brahmá, to the skies, in reward of his austerities. The story of his religious penance and adoration of Vishńu seems to be an embellishment interpolated by the Vaishńava Puráńas; Dhruva being adopted, as a saint, by their sect. The allusion to Súnŕitá, in our text, concurs with the form of the story as it appears elsewhere, to indicate the priority of the more simple legend.

The son of Ripu, by Brihatí, was the illustrious Chakshusha, who begot the Manu Chákshusha on Pushkariní, of the family of Varuna, the daughter of the venerable patriarch Anaranya. The Manu had, by his wife Nadvalá, * the daughter of the patriarch Vairája, ten noble sons: Úru, Puru, † Satadyumna, Tapaswin, Satyavách, Kavi, Agnishtoma, Atirátra, Sudyumna, and Abhimanyu. The wife of Uru, Agneyi, bore six excellent sons: Anga, Sumanas, Swáti, Kratu, Angiras, and Siva. Anga had, by his wife Suníthá, only one son, named Vena, whose right arm was rubbed, by the Rishis, for the purpose of producing from it progeny. From the arm of Vena, thus rubbed, sprang a celebrated monarch, named Prithu, by whom, in olden time, the earth was milked for the advantage of mankind.¹

¹ The descent of Prithu from Dhruva is similarly traced in the Matsya Purána, but with some variety of nomenclature. Thus, the wife of Dhruva is named Dhanya, and the eldest son of the The Vayu introduces another generation; making Manu, Taru. the eldest son of Ślishti,-or, as there termed, Pushti,-father of Udáradhí, and the latter, the father of Ripu, the father of Chakshusha, the father of the Manu. The Bhágavata * has an almost entirely different set of names, having converted the family of Dhruva into personifications of divisions of time and of day and night. The account there given is: Dhruva had, by his wife Bhrami (revolving), the daughter of Śiśumára (the sphere), Kalpa and Vatsara. The latter married Swarvithi, and had six sons: Pushpárna, Tigmaketu, Isha, Úrja, Vasu, Jaya. The first married Prabhá and Doshá, and had, by the former, Prátas (dawn), Madhyandina (noon), and Saya (evening), and, by the latter, Pradosha, Niśitha, and Vyushta, or the beginning, middle, and end, of night. The last has, by Pushkarińi, Chakshus, married to Ákúti, and the father of Chákshusha Manu. He has twelve sons: Puru, Kutsa, Trita, Dyumna, Satyavat, Rita, † Vrata, Agnishtoma, Atirátra, Pradyumna, Šibi, and Ulmuka. The last is the father of six sons, named as in our text, except the last, who is called Gaya. The eldest, Anga, is the father of Vena, the father of Prithu. These additions are, evidently, the creatures of the author's imagination. The Brahma Purána and Hari Vamsa have the same genealogy as the Vishnu; reading, as do the Matsya and Váyu, Pushkariní or Víraní, the daughter of Vírana, instead of Varuna. They, as well as copies of the text, present several MAITREYA.—Best of Munis, tell me why was the right hand of Vena rubbed by the holy sages, in consequence of which the heroic Prithu was produced.

PARÁSARA.—Suníthá was, originally, * the daughter of Mrityu, by whom she was given to Anga to wife. She bore him Vena, who inherited the evil propensities of his maternal grandfather. When he was inaugurated, by the Rishis, monarch of the earth, he caused it to be everywhere proclaimed, that no worship should be performed, no oblations offered, no gifts bestowed upon the Brahmans. "I, the king", said he, "am the lord of sacrifice. For who but I am entitled to the oblations?" The Rishis, respectfully approaching the sovereign. addressed him in melodious accents, and said: "Gracious prince, we salute you. Hear what we have to represent. For the preservation of your kingdom and your life, and for the benefit of all your subjects, permit us to worship Hari, the lord of all sacrifice, the god of gods, with solemn and protracted rites,1-a por-other varieties of nomenclature.† The Padma Puráńa (Bhúmi Khańda) says Anga was of the family of Atri; in allusion, perhaps, to the circumstance, mentioned in the Brahma Puráńa, of Uttánapáda's adoption by that Řishi.

^{*} Some MSS. have, instead of मृत्यो: प्रथमतोऽभवत्, मृत्यो: प्रथमजाभवत्। It seems, therefore, better to substitute: "Sunithá was Mfityu's eldest daughter."

Those princes have all their wishes gratified, in whose realms Hari, the lord of sacrifice, is adored with sacrificial rites." "Who", exclaimed Vena, "is superior to me? Who besides me is entitled to worship? Who is this Hari, whom you style the lord of sacrifice? Brahmá, Janárdana, Šambhu, Indra, Váyu, Yama, Ravi (the sun), Hutabhuj (fire), Varuńa, Dhátři, Púshan (the sun), Bhúmi (earth), the lord of night (the moon), all these, and whatever other gods there be who listen to our yows,—all these are present in the person of a king. The essence of a sovereign is all that is divine. Conscious of this, I have issued my commands: and look that you obey them. You are not to sacrifice, not to offer oblations, not to give alms. As the first duty of women is obedience to their lords, so observance of my orders is incumbent, holy men, on you." "Give command, great king", replied the Rishis, "that piety may suffer no decrease. All this world is but a trans-mutation of oblations; and, if devotion be suppressed, the world is at an end." But Vena was entreated in vain; and, although this request was repeated by the sages, he refused to give the order they suggested. Then those pious Munis were filled with wrath, and cried out to each other: "Let this wicked wretch be slain. The impious man who has reviled the god of sacrifice," who is without beginning or end, is not fit to reign over the earth." And they fell upon the king, and beat him with blades of holy grass, consecrated by prayer, and slew him, who had first been destroyed by his impiety towards god.

Afterwards the Munis beheld a great dust arise; and they said to the people who were nigh: "What is this?" And the people answered and said: "Now that the kingdom is without a king, the dishonest men have begun to seize the property of their neighbours. The great dust that you behold, excellent Munis, is raised by troops of clustering robbers, hastening to fall upon their prey." † The sages, hearing this, consulted, and together rubbed the thigh of the king, who had left no offspring, to produce a son. From the thigh, thus rubbed, came forth a being of the complexion of a charred stake, with flattened features (like a negro), and of dwarfish stature. "What am I to do?" cried he eagerly to the Munis. "Sit down" (nishida), said they: and thence his name was Nisháda. His descendants, the inhabitants of the Vindhya mountain, great Muni, are still called Nishádas, and are characterized by

1 The Matsya says there were born outcast or barbarous races, Mlechchhas (), as black as collyrium. The Bhágavata describes an individual of dwarfish stature, with short arms and legs, of a complexion as black as a crow, with projecting chin, broad flat nose, red eyes, and tawny hair; whose descendants were mountaineers and foresters.* The Padma (Bhúmi Khanda) has a similar description; adding to the dwarfish stature and black complexion, a wide mouth, large ears, and a protuberant belly. It also particularizes his posterity as Nishádas, Kirátas, Bhillas, Bahanakas, Bhrahmaras, Pulindas, and other barbarians or Mlechchhas, living in woods and on mountains. These passages intend, and do not much exaggerate, the uncouth appearance of the Gonds, Koles, Bhils, and other uncivilized tribes, scattered along the forests and mountains of central India, from Behar to born of his sins, and carrying them away. The Brahmans then proceeded to rub the right arm of the king, from which friction was engendered the illustrious son of Vena, named Prithu, resplendent in person, as if the blazing deity of Fire had been manifested.

There then fell from the sky the primitive bow (of Mahádeva) named Ájagava, and celestial arrows, and panoply from heaven. At the birth of Prithu, all living creatures rejoiced; and Vena, delivered, by his being born, from the hell named Put, ascended to the realms above." The seas and rivers, bringing jewels (from their depths), and water to perform the ablutions of his installation, appeared. The great parent of all, Brahmá, with the gods and the descendants of Angiras (the fires), and with all things animate or inanimate, assembled, and performed the ceremony of consecrating the son of Vena. Beholding in his right hand the (mark of the) discus of Vishnu, Brahmá recognized a portion of that divinity in Prithu, and was much pleased. For the mark of Vishnu's discus is visible in the hand of one who is born to be a universal emperor,1 one whose power is invincible even by the gods.

VISHNU PURÁNA.

The mighty Prithu, the son of Vena, being thus invested with universal dominion by those who were skilled in the rite, soon removed the grievances of the people whom his father had oppressed; and, from winning their affections, he derived the title of Rájá or king.1 The waters became solid, when he traversed the ocean: the mountains opened him a path: his banner passed unbroken (through the forests): the earth needed not cultivation; and, at a thought, food was prepared: all kine were like the cow of plenty: honey was stored in every flower. At the sacrifice of the birth of Prithu, which was performed by Brahmá, the intelligent Súta (herald or bard) was produced, in the juice of the moon-plant, on the very birth-day.2 At that great sacrifice also was produced the accomplished Mágadha. And the holy sages said to these two persons: "Praise ye the king Prithu, the illustrious son of Vena. For this is your especial function, and here is a fit subject for your praise." But they respectfully replied to the Brahmans: "We know not the acts of the new-born king of the earth. His merits are not understood by us: his fame is not spread abroad. Inform us upon what subject we may dilate in his praise." "Praise the king", said the Rishis, "for the acts this ^{&#}x27; From Rága (ব্যা), 'passion' or 'affection.' But the more obvious etymology is Ráj (ব্যাত্ত্ৰ), 'to shine' or 'be splendid.'

² The birth of Prithu is to be considered as the sacrifice, of which Brahmá, the creator, was the performer. But, in other places, as in the Padma, it is considered that an actual sacrificial rite was celebrated, at which the first encomiasts were produced. The Bhágavata does not account for their appearance.

heroic monarch will perform: praise him for the virtues he will display."

The king, hearing these words, was much pleased, and reflected, that persons acquire commendation by virtuous actions, and that, consequently, his virtuous conduct would be the theme of the eulogium which the bards were about to pronounce. Whatever merits, then, they should panegyrize, in their encomium, he determined that he would endeavour to acquire; and, if they should point out what faults ought to be avoided, he would try to shun them. He, therefore, listened attentively, as the sweet-voiced encomiasts celebrated the future virtues of Prithu, the enlightened son of Vena.

"The king is a speaker of truth, bounteous, an observer of his promises. He is wise, benevolent, patient, valiant, and a terror to the wicked. He knows his duties; he acknowledges services; he is compassionate and kind-spoken. He respects the venerable; he performs sacrifices; he reverences the Brahmans. He cherishes the good, and, in administering justice, is indifferent to friend or foe."

The virtues thus celebrated by the Súta and the Mágadha were cherished in the remembrance of the Raja, and practised, by him, when occasion arose. Protecting this earth, the monarch performed many great sacrificial ceremonies, accompanied by liberal donations. His subjects soon approached him, suffering from the famine by which they were afflicted; as all the edible plants had perished during the season of anarchy. In reply to his question of the cause of their coming, they told him that, in the interval in which the earth was without a king, all vegetable products had been withheld, and that, consequently, the people had perished. "Thou", said they, "art the bestower of subsistence to us: thou art appointed, by the creator, the protector of the people. Grant us vegetables, the support of the lives of thy subjects, who are perishing with hunger."

On hearing this, Prithu took up his divine bow Ajagava, and his celestial arrows, and, in great wrath, marched forth to assail the Earth. Earth, assuming the figure of a cow, fled hastily from him, and traversed, through fear of the king, the regions of Brahmá and the heavenly spheres. But, wherever went the supporter of living things, there she beheld Vainya with uplifted weapons. At last, trembling (with terror), and anxious to escape his arrows, the Earth addressed Prithu, the hero of resistless prowess. "Know you not, king of men", said the Earth, "the sin of killing a female, that you thus perseveringly seek to slay me?" The prince replied: "When the happiness of many is secured by the destruction of one malignant being, the death of that being is an act of virtue." "But", said the Earth, "if, in order to promote the welfare of your subjects, you put an end to me, whence, best of monarchs, will thy people derive their support?" "Disobedient to my rule", rejoined Prithu, "if I destroy thee, I will support my people by the efficacy of my own devotions." Then the Earth, overcome with apprehension, and trembling in every limb, respectfully saluted the king, and thus spake: "All undertakings are successful, if suitable means of effecting them are employed. I will impart to you means of success, which you can make use of, if you please. All vegetable products are old, and destroyed by me: but, at your command, I will restore them, as developed from my milk. Do you, therefore, for the benefit of mankind, most virtuous of princes, give me that calf by which I may be able to secrete milk. Make, also, all places level, so that I may cause my milk, the seed of all vegetation, to flow everywhere around."

Prithu, accordingly, uprooted the mountains, by hundreds and thousands, for myriads of leagues; and they were, thenceforth, piled upon one another. Before his time there were no defined boundaries of villages or towns, upon the irregular surface of the earth; there was no cultivation, no pasture, no agriculture, no highway for merchants. All these things (or all civilization) originated in the reign of Prithu. Where the ground was made level, the king induced his subjects to take up their abode. Before his time, also, the fruits and roots which constituted the food of the people were procured with great difficulty; all vegetables having been destroyed: and he, therefore, having made Swáyambhuva Manu the calf, milked the Earth, and received the milk into his own hand, for the benefit of mankind. Thence proceeded all kinds of corn and vegetables upon which people subsist now and perpetually. By granting life to the Earth, Prithu was as her father; and she thence derived the patronymic appellation Prithiví (the daughter of Prithu). Then the gods, the sages, the demons, the Rákshasas, the Gandharvas, Yakshas, Pitris, serpents, mountains, and trees, took a milking vessel suited to their kind, and milked the earth of appropriate milk. And the milker and the calf were both peculiar to their own species. ¹

¹ The Matsya, Brahma, Bhagavata, and Padma enter into a greater detail of this milking, specifiying, typically, the calf, the milker, the milk, and the vessel. Thus, according to the Matsya, the Rishis milked the earth through Bribaspati; their calf was Soma; the Vedas were the vessel; and the milk was devotion. When the gods milked the earth, the milker was Mitra (the sun); Indra was the calf; superhuman power was the produce. The gods had a gold, the Pitris, a silver, vessel: and, for the latter, the milker was Antaka (death); Yama was the calf; the milk was Swadhá or oblation. The Nágas or snake-gods had a gourd for their pail; their calf was Takshaka; Dhritarashtra (the serpent) was their milker; and their milk was poison. For the Asuras, Máyá was the milk; Virochana, the son of Prahláda, was the calf; the milker was Dwimurdhan; and the vessel was of iron. The Yakshas made Vaiśravańa their calf; their vessel was of unbaked earth; the milk was the power of disappearing. The Rákshasas and others employed Raupyanábha as the milker; their calf was Sumalin; and their milk was blood. Chitraratha was the calf, Vasuruchi, the milker, of the Gandharvas and nymphs. who milked fragrant odours into a cup of lotos-leaves. On behalf of the mountains, Meru was the milker; Himavat, the calf; the pail was of crystal; and the milk was of herbs and gems. The trees extracted sap in a vessel of the Palása; the Sál being the milker, and the Plaksha, the calf. The descriptions that occur in the Bhágavata,* Padma, and Brahma Puráńas are, occasionally, slightly varied; but they are, for the most part, in the same words as that of the Matsya. These mystifications are, all, probably, subsequent modifications of the original simple allegory, which typified the earth as a cow, who yielded to every class of beings the milk they desired, or the object of their wishes.

* The account given in the Bhágavata-puráńa-IV., 18, 12-27-is in these words:

the lord of the earth, and who, from conciliating the affections of the people, was the first ruler to whom the title of Rájá was ascribed. Whoever shall recite this story of the birth of Přithu, the son of Vena, shall never suffer any retribution for the evil he may have committed. And such is the virtue of the tale of Přithu's birth, that those who hear it repeated shall be relieved from affliction.

¹ Another reading is, दुःखन्नीपश्चं * * * करोति। 'It counteracts evil dreams.' The legend of Prithu is briefly given in the Mahábhárata, Rája Dharma, and occurs in most of the Puránas, but in greatest detail in our text, in the Bhágavata, and, especially, in the Padma, Bhúmi Khanda, s. 29, 30. All the versions, however, are, essentially, the same.

"Les reptiles, les serpents, les animaux venimeux, les Nâgas prirent Takchaka pour veau, et reçurent dans leur bouche le poison qu'ils avaient trait de la vache.

"Prenant pour veau le taureau, et pour vase les forêts, les bestiaux reçurent l'herbe des pâturages. Accompagnées du roi des animaux, les bêtes féroces,

"Les arbres, rois des forêts, prenant le figuier pour veau, recueillirent chacun le lait de leur propre séve; les montagnes, amenant l'Himavat, recueillirent chacune sur leurs sommets les métaux variés.

"Toutes les créatures enfin, prenant comme veau le chef de leur espèce, reçurent chacune dans leur vase le lait qu'elles étaient venues traire de la vache, mère féconde de tous biens, qu'avait domptée Pfithu.

"C'est ainsi, ô descendant de Kuru, que Prithu et les autres êtres, avides de nourriture, trouvèrent tous d'excellents aliments dans les diverses espèces de lait qu'ils reçurent, en présentant chacun à la terre son veau et son vase."

CHAPTER XIV.

Descendants of Prithu. Legend of the Prachetasas: they are desired, by their father, to multiply mankind, by worshipping Vishúu: they plunge into the sea, and meditate on and praise him: he appears, and grants their wishes.

Príthu had two valiant sons, Antardhi and Pálin. The son of Antardhána, by his wife Sikhańdini, was Havirdhána, to whom Dhishańa, a princess of the race of Agni, bore six sons: Práchínabarhis, Śukra, Gaya,

पृथोः पुत्री महावीयीं जज्ञातेनार्धिपालिनी।

M. Langlois* understands the two last words as a compound epithet: "Et jouirent du pouvoir de se rendre invisibles." The construction would admit of such a sense:† but it seems more probable that they are intended for names. The lineage of Prithu is immediately continued through one of them, Antardhána, which is the same as Antardhi; as the commentator states, with regard to that appellation: uniteralistic; and as the commentator on the Hari Vamsa remarks, of the succeeding name: uniteralistic i 'One of the brothers being called Antardhána or Antardhi' leaves no other sense for Pálin but that of a proper name. The Bhágavata; gives Prithu five sons: Vijitáswa, Dhúmrakesa, Haryaksha, Dravina, and Vrika; and adds, § that the elder was also named Antardhána, in consequence of having obtained, from Indra, the power of making himself invisible:

यन्तर्धानगतिं श्कालन्धान्तर्धानसंचितः।

[•] Vol. I., p. 10.

¹ The Bhágavata, as usual, modifies this genealogy. Antardhána has, by Śikhańdiní, three sons, who were the three fires, Pávaka, Pavamána, and Śuchi, condemned, by a curse of Vasishtha, to be born again. By another wife, Nabhaswatí, he has Havirdhána, whose sons are the same as those of the text; only giving another name, Barhishad, as well as Práchínabarhis, to the first. According to the Mahábhárata (Moksha Dharma), which has been followed by the Padma Purána, Práchínabarhis was born in the family of Atri:

श्रविवंशे समुत्यन्नो ब्रह्मयोनिः सनातनः। प्राचीनवर्हिर्भगवान्॥

प्राचीनायाः कुशास्तस्य पृथिवामभवस्त्रेने ।

Kuśa or Barhis is, properly, 'sacrificial grass' (Poa); and Práchínágra, literally, 'having its tips towards the east'; the direction in which it should be placed upon the ground, as a seat for the gods, on occasion of offerings made to them. The name, therefore, intimates either that the practice originated with him, or, as the commentator explains it, that he was exceedingly devout, offering sacrifices, or invoking the gods, everywhere: सर्वेच यज्ञान्ता । The Hari Vamsa; adds a verse to that of our text, reading:

प्राचीनायाः नुशास्त्रस्य पृथिवां जनमेनय। प्राचीनवर्हिभेगवान्पृथिवीतस्वारिणः।

^{*} Bhágavata-purána, IV., 24, 4. At IV., 1, 59, they are spoken of as sons of Agni by Swáhá. And see pp. 155 and 156, supra.

[†] The Bhágavata-purána, IV., 24, 8, gives their names as follows: Barhishad, Gaya, Śukla, Krishna, Satya, and Jitavrata.

which M. Langlois* has rendered: 'Quand il marchait sur la terre, les pointes de cousa étaient courbées vers l'orient'; which he supposes to mean, 'que ce prince avait tourné ses pensées et porté sa domination vers l'est:" a supposition that might have been obviated by a little further consideration of the verse of Manu† to which he refers: "If he have sitten on culms of kuśa, with their points toward the east, and be purified by rubbing that holy grass on both his hands, and be further prepared by three suppressions of breath, each equal, in time, to five short vowels, he then may fitly pronounce om." + The commentary explains the passage as above, referring पृथिवीतलचारिण: to कुशा:, not to तस्यः as: पृथियां तस्य प्राचीनायाः कुशाः पृथिवीतनचारिणो भुवः स्वरूपे प्रसर्नाः क्रत्नभूमण्डलयापिन ग्रासन्। ततः स प्राचीनवर्हिः। 'He was called Prachinabarhis, because his sacred grass, pointing east, was going upon the very earth, or was spread over the whole earth.' § The text of the Bhágavata also explains clearly what is meant:

यखेदं देवयजनमनुयज्ञं वितन्वतः। प्राचीनाग्रैः कुग्रैरासीदाखृतं वसुधातलम्॥

'By whose sacred grass, pointing to the east, as he performed sacrifice after sacrifice, the whole earth, his sacrificial ground, was overspread.'

* Vol. I., p. 10. † II., 75: प्राक्कलान्पर्युपासीनः पवित्रेश्वेव पावितः। प्राणायामस्त्रिभः पृतस्तत त्रोंकार्महीति॥

* This rendering, which is that of Sir William Jones, is not altogether in keeping with the commentary of Kullúka Bhatía.

§ Rather: "On his land the sacred grass, pointing towards the east, was forthcoming on the face of the earth, as it were, that is to say, was filling the entire circuit of the earth. Hence he was called Prächinabarhis."

¶ Burnouf—Vol. II., Preface, p. III., note—renders thus: "C'est lui qui, faisant succèder les sacrifices aux sacrifices, couvrit de tiges de Kuça to him, and who had, by the king, ten sons, who were all styled Prachetasas, and were skilled in military science. They all observed the same duties, practised religious austerities, and remained immersed in the bed of the sea for ten thousand years.

Maitreya.—You can inform me, great sage, why the magnanimous Prachetasas engaged in penance in the waters of the sea.

Paráśara.—The sons of Práchínabarhis were, originally, informed, by their father, who had been appointed as a patriarch, and whose mind was intent on multiplying mankind, that he had been respectfully enjoined, by Brahmá, the god of gods, to labour to this end, and that he had promised obedience. "Now, therefore", continued he, "do you, my sons, to oblige me, diligently promote the increase of the people: for the orders of the father of all creatures are entitled to respect." The sons of the king, having heard their father's words, replied: "So be it." But they then inquired of him, as he could best explain it, by what means they might accomplish the augmentation of mankind. He said to them: "Whoever worships Vishnu, the bestower of good, attains, undoubtedly, the object of his desires. There is no other mode. What further can I tell you? Adore, therefore, Govinda, who is Hari, the lord of all beings, in order to effect the increase dont les extrémités regardaient l'orient, la surface de la terre, dont il faisait ainsi un terrain consacré."

Also see the Bhágavata-purána, IV., 29, 49.

Sridhara Swamin's comment on IV., 24, 10, is as follows: र्हं वसु-धातलं देवयवनं यचवाटं वितन्वती यचैको यज्ञः कृतस्तसमीप एव यज्ञानारं कुर्वतः सतः। यत एव पाचीनवर्हिरित्युच्यते। of the human race, if you wish to succeed. The eternal Purushottama is to be propitiated by him who wishes for virtue, wealth, enjoyment, or liberation. Adore him, the imperishable, by whom, when propitiated, the world was first created; and mankind will assuredly be multiplied."

Thus instructed by their father, the ten Prachetasas plunged into the depths of the ocean, and, with minds wholly devoted to Náráyańa, the sovereign of the universe, who is beyond all worlds, were engrossed by religious austerity for ten thousand years. Remaining there, they, with fixed thoughts, praised Hari, who, when propitiated, confers on those who praise him all that they desire.

MAITREYA.—The excellent praises that the Prachetasas addressed to Vishnu, whilst they stood in the deep, you, O best of Munis, are qualified to repeat to me.

Paráśara.—Hear, Maitreya, the hymn which the Prachetasas, as they stood in the waters of the sea, sang, of old, to Govinda, their nature being identified with him:—

"We bow to him whose glory is the perpetual theme of every speech; him first, him last; the supreme lord of the boundless world; who is primeval light; who is without his like; indivisible and infinite; the origin of all existent things, movable or stationary. To that supreme being who is one with time, whose first forms, though he be without form, are day and evening and night, be adoration! Glory to him, the life of all living things, who is the same with the moon, the receptacle of ambrosia, drunk daily by the gods and progenitors;

to him who is one with the sun, the cause of heat and cold and rain, who dissipates the gloom, and illuminates the sky with his radiance; to him who is one with earth, all-pervading, and the asylum of smell and other objects of sense, supporting the whole world by its solidity! We adore that form of the deity Hari which is water, the womb of the world, the seed of all living beings. Glory to the mouth of the gods, the eater of the Havya; to the eater of the Kavya, the mouth of the progenitors; to Vishnu, who is identical with fire; to him who is one with air, the origin of ether, existing as the five vital airs in the body, causing constant vital action; to him who is identical with the atmosphere, pure, illimitable, shapeless, separating all creatures! Glory to Krishna, who is Brahma in the form of sensible objects; who is ever the direction of the faculties of sense! We offer salutation to that supreme Hari who is one with the senses, both subtile and substantial, the recipient of all impressions, the root of all knowledge; to the universal soul, who, as internal intellect, delivers the impressions, received by the senses, to soul; to him who has the properties of Prakriti; in whom, without end, rest all things; from whom all things proceed; and who is that into which all things resolve. We worship that Purushottoma, the god who is pure spirit, and who, without qualities, is ignorantly considered as endowed with qualities. We adore that supreme Brahma, the ultimate condition of Vishnu, unproductive, unborn, pure, void of qualities, and free from accidents; who is neither high nor low, neither bulky nor minute, has neither shape, nor colour, nor shadow, nor substance, nor affection, nor body; who is neither ethereal nor susceptible of contact, smell, or taste; who has neither eyes, nor ears, nor motion, nor speech, nor breath, nor mind, nor name, nor race, nor enjoyment, nor splendour; who is without cause, without fear, without error, without fault, undecaying, immortal, free from passion, without sound, imperceptible, inactive, independent of place or time, detached from all investing properties; but (illusively) exercising irresistible might, and identified with all beings, dependent upon none. Glory to that nature of Vishńu, which tongue cannot tell, nor has eye beheld!"

Thus glorifying Vishńu, and intent in meditation on him, the Prachetasas passed ten thousand years of austerity in the vast ocean; on which, Hari, being pleased with them, appeared to them amidst the waters, of the complexion of the full-blown lotos-leaf. Beholding him mounted on the king of birds, (Garuda), the Prachetasas bowed down their heads in devout homage; when Vishńu said to them: "Receive the boon you have desired; for I, the giver of good, am content with you, and am present." The Prachetasas replied to him with reverence, and told him that the cause of their devotions was the command of their father to effect the multiplication of mankind. The god, having, accordingly, granted to them the object of their prayers, disappeared; and they came up from the water.

"It is a collection of eight extremography imputates, appropriately illustrated with fifty drawings on wood, by Affed Crowquill. The volume is nanisomely got up, and will be found worthy of close companionship with the "Adventures of Moster Owiglass," produced by the same publishers ""-Spectator."

"Other than quaint, Affred Crowquill can scarcely be. In some of his heads, too, he seems to have caught with spirit the Hindoo character,"—Athenaum.

"The humour of these ridiculous adventures is thoroughly genuine, and very often quite irresistible. A more amusing volume, indeed, is rarely to be met with, white the notes in the Appendix display considerable erudition and research. In short, whose would keep up the good old kindly practice of making Christmas presents to one's friends and relatives, may go far afield and never fall in with a gift so acceptable as a copy of the 'Strange' Surprising Adventures of the Venerable Gooroo Simple."

"A popular satire on the Brahmins current in several parts of India. The excellent introduction to the story or collection of incidents, and the notes and glossary at the close of the Volume, will afford a good clue to the various habits and predilections of the Brahmins, which the narrative so keenly satirises. Most telling and characteristic illustrations, from the penell of Alfred Crowquill, are lavishly sprinkled throughout the volume, and the whole getting up entitles it to rank as a gift book worthy of special notice."—English Charchman.

"The public, to their sorrow, have not seen much of Alfred Crowquill lately; but we are glad to find him in the field again, with the story of the 'Gooroo Simple.' The book is most excellent fooling, but contains, besides, a mine of recondite Oriental lore, necessitating even the addition of notes and a glossary; and moreover, there is a vein of quiet philosophy running through it very pleasant to peruse."—Illustrated London News.

"The story is treasitibly funny, and is aided by fitty illustrations by Alfred Crowquill. The book is got up with that luxury of paper and type which is of itself, and in itself, a pleasure to "Deposite in the properties of the general news as Alfred Crowquill with no fewer than fifty comie woodcuts. It is no less animirably got up, and beautifully bound, and it will be most acceptable to a large portion of the public." Otheserver.

"Tyll's fame has gone abroad into all lands this, the narrative of his exploits, has been published in innumerable editions, even with all manner of learned glosses, and translated into Latin English, French, Dutch, Tolish, etc. Wo may asy that to few mortals has it been granted Tyll: for now, after the entire theory of the Scots, and the Admirable Crichton still more rapidly is grown a shadow, and Edward Longshanks sleeps unregarded, save by a few antiquarian English. Tyll's native village is pointed out with pride to the traveller, and his tombstone, with a sculptured pun on his name—namely, an Owl and a Glass, still stands, or pretends to stand, at Möllen, near Lübeck, where, since 130s, his once nimble bones have been at rest."—Thomas Carlyle's Essays, vol. ii. pp 287, 288.

"A book for the antiquary for the satirist, and the historian of sature; for the boy who reads for adventure's sake ; for the grown person, loving every fiction that has a character in it. Mr. Mackenzie's language is quaint, racy, and antique, without a tiresome stiffness. The book, as it stands, is a well-ome pice of English reading, with hardly a dry or tassless moroel in it. We fancy that few Christmas books will be put forth more peculiar and characteristic than the comely English version of the Läcentures of Tyll Oedplass."

"Exquisitely beautiful writing. It is full of sights and lovers aspirations, with many charming fancies and poelit thoughts. It is full or sights and lovers aspirations, with many charming fancies and poelit thoughts. It is pretared and Laura over again, and the numerous quotations from the Italian interspersed, together with images suggested by the passionate melodies of the great composers, pretty clearly indicate the burden which runs like a rich refrain throughout. . Of its execution we have the right to speak in terms of unqualified praise,"—Weekly Dispatch.

"That Winckelmann was well fitted for the task of witting a History of Ancient Art, no one can deny who is acquainted with his profound learning and genius. He undoubtedly possessed, in the highest degree, the power of appreciating artistic skill wherever it was met with, but never more so than when seen in the garb of antiquity. The work is of no common order, and a careful study of the great principles embodied in it must necessarily tend to form a pure, correct, and elevated taske."

The work is throughout lucid, and free from the pedantry of technicality. Its clearness constitutes its great charm. It does not discuss any one subject at great length, but aims at a general view of Art, with attention to its minute developments. It is, if we may use the phrase, a Grummar of Greek Art, a size quar now to all who would thoroughly investigate its language of form." Literary World.

"Winckelmann is a standard writer, to whom most students of art have been more or less indebted. He possessed extensive information, a refined taste, and great zeal. His style is plain, direct, and specifie, so that you are never at a loss for his meaning. Some very good outlines, representing fine types of Ancient Greek Art, illustrate the text, and the volume is got up in a style worthy of its subject."—Spectator.

Hunt. The Religion of the Heart.

A Manual of Faith and Duty. By Leich Hunt. Feap. 8vo. 6s.

Professor Newman has kindly permitted Mr. Chapman to print the following letter addressed to thim—

"Mr. Leigh Hunt's little book has been very acceptable to me. I think there is in it all that tenderness of wisdom which is the peculiar possession and honour of advanced years. I presume he regards his book as only a contribution to the Church of the Future, and the Liturgical part of it as a mere sample. I feel with him that we cannot afford to abandon the old principle of a 'public recognition of common religious sentiments:' and I rejoice that one like him has taken the lead in pointing out the direction in which we must look.

"To the class of thinkers who are feelers also, to those whose soul is larger than mere logic can compass, and who habitually endeavour, on the wings of Imagination, to soar into regions which transcend reason, this beautiful book is addressed. . . It cannot be read even as a book (and not accepting it as a ritual) without humanizing and enlarging the reader's mind."

Leader.

"The 'Religion of the Heart' is a manual of aspiration, faith, and duty, conceived in the spirit of natural piety. . . It is the object of the book to supply one of those needs of the popular mind which the speculative rationalism is ant to neglect, to aid in the culture of sound habits and of reasonable religious affections. If the time has not yet and the proper than the recorded as a suggestion and help in that direction. —Westmanter Review.

"This volume deserves to be read by many to whom, on other grounds, it may perhaps prove little acceptable, for the grave and thoughtful mater it contains, appealing to the heart of every truthful person. . . Kindly emotions and a pure morality, a true sense of the beneficence of God and of the beaution of central preference of God and of the beaution, alseredits, by his manner of stating his beliefs, the comprehensive charity which sustains them. The most rigidly orthodox may a tone of gentle kindliness, may let his heart open to receive all that part (the main part) of Mr. Hunt's religion, which is, in truth, the purest Christianity."—Examiner.

THEISM, ATHEISM, AND THE POPULAR THEOLOGY. Sermons by THEO-DOBE PARKER, author of "A Discourse of Matters pertaining to Religion," etc. A portrait of the author engraved on steel is prefixed. Price 9s.

The aim of this work is defined by its author at the beginning of the first Discourse as follows:—"I propose to speak of Atheism, of the Popular Theology, and of pure Theism. Of each first, as a Theory of the Universe, and then as a Principle of Practical Life; first as Speculative Philosophy, then as Practical Ethics."

(Parker's books) and reflect on them... there are glorious bursts of elequence, flashings of time genius."—A the sermons which issue from the competence of the sermons which issue from the sermons which issue from the sermons which issue from the windom and beauty."—Leader.

"The method of these discourses is practical, addressing their argument to common sense. Atheism and the popular theology are exhibited in their repulsive relations to common iffe, while from the better conception of divine things, of which the writer is the chief apostle, there is shown to arise, in natural development, the tranquil security of religious trust, guidance, and comfort in all social duty, and the clear hope of the world to come,"—Westminster Revi. w.

Mr. Tayler regards all parties in turn from an equitable point of view, is tole-rant lowards intolerance, and admires zeal and rant towards intolerance, and admires zeal and excuses fanaticism wherever he sees honesty. "Of the many remarkable facts related in this book we can say little now. What rather strikes us is the elevating influence of an acknowledgment of mystery in any form at all. In spite of all that we have said, there is a tone in Mr. Atkinson's thoughts far above those of most of us who live in slavery to daily experience. However wildly he has wandered in scarch of it, truth is all for which he cares to live. If he is dogmatic, he is not vain : if he is drying up the fountain of life, yet to him life is holy. He does not care for fame, for wealth, for rank, for reputation, for anything it can all this because he feels the unknown and terrible forces and he related the warp and woof of the marvellous existence."—Fraser's Magazine.

"The 'Cours de Philosophie Positive' is at once a compendious evelopsedia of science and an exhibition of scientific method. It defines rigorously the characteristics of the several orders of phenomens with which the particular sciences are concerned, arranges them in an ascending scale of complexity and speciality, beginning with mathematics and ending with social physics or sociology, and assigns to each science its proper method in accordance with the nature of the phenomena to be investigated. . . Because it is not merely a cyclopadia of scientific facts, but an exhibition of the methods of human knowledge and of the relations between its different branches, M. "Dictionaries are a class of books not usually esteemed light reading; but no intelligent man were to be pitted who should find himself shut po no a rainy day, in a lonely house, in the dreariest part of Salisbury Plain, with no emeans of recreation than that which Mr. Wedgwood's Dictionary of English Etymology would afford him. He would read it through, from cover to cover, at a sitting, and only regret that he had not the second volume to begin upon forthwith. It is a very able book, of great research, full of delightful surprises, a repertory of the fairy tales of linguistic science."—Spectutor.

This volume is one of the series published by the Sydenham Society, and, as such, originally issued to its members only. The work having gone out of print, this new edition—the third—has been undertaken by the present proprietors of the copyright, with the view not only of meeting the numerous demands from the class to which it was primarily addressed by its learned author, but also for extending its circulation to the general reader, to whom it had, heretofore, been all but inaccessible, owing its described mode of its publication, and to whom it is believed it will be very acceptable, on account of the great and growing interest of its subject-matter, and the elegant and successful treatment thereof. The volume is a verbatim reprint from the second edition; but its value has been enhanced by the addition of a paper on "Child-Fligrimages, never before translated; and the present edition is therefore the first and only one in the English language which contains all the contributions of Dr. Hecker to the history of medicine.

Frequently as we freed of the works of Caxton, and the early English Printers, and of their black letter books, very few persons have ever had the opportunity of seeing any of these productions, and forming a proper estimate of the ingenuity and skill of those who first practised the "Noble Art of Printing."

This reproduction of the first work printed by Caxton at Westminster, containing 25 woodcuts, is intended, in some measure, to supply this deficiency, and bring the present age into some-what greater incimecy with the Father of Ea-glish Printers.

The type has been carefully imitated, and the cuts traced from the copy in the British Museum. The paper has also been made ex-pressly, as near as possible like the original.

This work is intended to supply a great want, now that the study of Ethnology has proved that exotic languages are not mere curiosities, but essential and interesting parts of the natural library of man, forming one of the office and intended of the color of the color of the soil he lives upon. No one can yenture to write the history of America without a knowledge of her adoriginal languages; and unimportant as such researches may seem to men engaged in the mere bustling occupations of life, they will at least acknowledge that these records of the past, like the stern-lights of a departing ship, are the last glimmers of savage life, as it becomes absorbed or recedes before the tide of civilization. Dr. Ludewig and Prof. Turner have made most diligent use of the public and private collections in America, access to all of which was most liberally granted to them. This has placed at their disposal facility of the collections in the light of univoden recount. But English and Continental libraries have also been ransacked; and Dr. Ludewig kept up a constant and active correspondence with here of similar tastes and pursuits in France, Spain, and Holland, determined to leave no stone unturned to render his labours as complete as possible. The volume, perfect in itself, is the first of an enlarged edition of Vaters "Linguarum totius orbis Instituted and the content of the particularly to the following."

OPINIONS OF THE PRESS.

"This work, mainly the production of the late Herr Ludewig, a German, naturalized in America, is devoted to an account of the literature of the aboriginal languages of that country. It gives an alphabetical liss of the various tribes of whose lanappropriate indigences of this continuous continuous apparent and apphabetical list of the various tribes of whose languages any record remains, and refer to the works, papers, or manuscripts, in which such information may be found. The work has evidently been a labour of love; and as no pains seem to have been spared by the editors, Prof. Turner and Mr. Tribner, in rendering the work as accurate and complete as possible, those who are most interested in its contents will be best able to hadge of the labour and assistintly bestowed upon it by auttion, others, and publisher. — Athenceum, 6th April, 1838.

"This is the first instalment of a work oftens, and publisher." — Athenceum, 6th April, 1838.

"This is the first instalment of a work allowed will be of the greatest value to philologists; and is a competition of the aborightal languages of the American condinents, and a digest of all the known literature bearing upon those languages. Mr. Trüthner's hand has been engaged passum, and in his preface he lays claim to about one-sixth of the whole; and we have no doubt that the encourage-ment with which this portion of the work will be received by scholars, will be such as to inspire Mr. Trübner with sufficient confidence to persevere in his arduous and most honourable task." — The Critic, 15th Dec., 1857.

Trübner (Nicolas). TRÜBNER'S BIB-LICOBAPHICAL GUIDE TO AMERICAN LI-TERATURE: a Classed List of Books published in the United States of America, from 1817 to 1857. With Bibliographical Introduction, Notes, and Alphabetical Index. Compiled and Edited by NICOLAS TRUBBER. In One vol. 8vo. of 750 pages, half-bound, price 18s.

This work, it is helieved, is the first attempt to narshal the Literature of the United States of America during the last forty years, according to the generally received ibility as according to the generally received ibility application of the generally received ibility application. The Librarian will welcome it, no doubit, as companion volume to Brunet, Lowndes, and Ebert; whilst, to the bookseller, it will be a faithful guide to the American branch of English Literature—a branch which, on account of its rapid increase and rising importance, begins to force itself daily more and more upon his attention. Nor will the work be of less interest to the man of letters inasmuch as it comprises complete Tables of Contents to all the more prominent Collections of the Americans, to the Journals, Memoirs, Proceedings, and Transactions of their learned Societies—and thus furnishes an intelligible key to a department of American scientific activity hitherto but imperfectly known and understood in Europe.

"It has been reserved for a foreigner to have compiled, for the benefit of European readers, a really trustworthy guide to Anglo-American literature. This honourable distinction has been fairly won by Mr. Nieholas Trübner, the intelligent and well-known publisher in Faternoster-row. "Mr. Trübner deserves much credit for being the first to arrange bibliography according to the received rules of the art. He began the labour in 1855, and the first volume was published in that year; constituting, in fact, the carliest attempt, on this side of the Atlantic, to catalogue American books. The present volume, of course, is enlarged, and is more perfect in every respect. The method of classification is exceedingly clear and useful.

"In short, it presents the actual state of literature, as well as the ourse of its development, from the beginnfall have to look hereafter; we are the second state of the control of the second state of t

"Mr. Truthner's book is by far the most complete American bibliography that has yet appeared, and displays an amount of patience and research that does him infinite credit. We have tested the accuracy of the work upon several points demanding much care and inquiry, and the result has always been satisfactory. Our American brethren cannot fail to feel complimented by the production of this volume, which in quantity almost equals our own London catalogue."—The Bookseller, February 24, 1899.

"To say of this volume that it entirely fulfils the promise of its title-page, is possibly the highest and most truthful commendation that can be awarded to it. Mr. Trübner deserves, however, something beyond general praise for the patient and intelligent labour with which he has elaborated the earlier forms of the work into that which it now bears. What was once but a scanty volume, has now become magnified, under his care, to one of considerable size, and was once little better than a dry catalogue, may be a support of the control of first-rate importance. His position as an American literary agent has, doubliess, been very favorable to Mr. Trübner, by throwing matter in his way; and he confesses, in his preface, that it is to this source that he is mainly indebted for the materials which have enabled him to construct the work before us. Mr. Trübners object in com-

"This is not only a very useful, because well executed, bibliographical work—it is also a work of much interest to all who are connected with literature. The bulk of it consists of a classified list, with date of publication, size, and price, of all the works, original or translated, which have appeared in the United States during the last forty years; and an alphaetical index facilitates reference to any particular work or author. On the merits of this portion of the work we cannot, of course, be expected to form a judgment. It would require something of the special crudition of Mr. Trübner himself, to say how far he in the work of the more of all the special crudition of the contents of railen shore of his undertaking sitons. There is one indication, however, of his careful minuteness, which suggests the amount of labour that must have been bestowed on the work—namely, the full enumeration of all the contents of the various Transactions and Scientific Journals. Thus, the 'Transactions of the American Philosophical Society, from the year 1769 to 1857—no index to which has yet appeared in America—are in this work made easy of reference, every paper of every volume being mentioned scriatim. "The subject of my letter to-day may seem to be of a purely literary character, but I feel justified to claim a more general interest for it. That subject is connected with the good reputation of the United States abroad, It is likewise connected with the general topic of my two former letters. Now, I am going to speak of a book just ready to leave the press of a London publisher, which, whilet is a remarkable instance of the truth of my assertion in reference to the Germans, must be considered as serving the interests of the United States, by promoting the good reputation of American life in an uncommon degree. "The London book trade has a firm, Trübner & Co., of whose business transactions American literature, as well as literature on America, form a principal branch. "There are hundreds of men of moderate scholarship who would gladly stand on some higher and more assured point. They feel that they have acquired much information, but they also feel the need of that subtle discipline, literary education, without which all mere learning is the rudis indipersa moles, as much of a stumbling-block as an aid. To those in such a condition, works on bibliography are invaluable. For direction in classifying all reading, whether English or American, Allhomes Dictionary is admirable; but, for particular information as to the American side of the house, the recently published Bibliographical Guide to American Literature, by Nicolas Trübner, of London, may be conscientiously commended. Some of our readers, whose attention has been particularly called to scientific and literary matters, may remember meeting, some years since, in this country, a most intelligent foreigner, who visited the United States for the purpose of extending his business connections, and making a personal investigation into the condition of literature in the New World. Mr. Nicholan Tribmer—the gentleman to whom we have made reference—although by birth a German, and by education and profession a London bookseller, could hardly be called a 'stranger in America,' for he had sent before him a most valuable 'letter of introduction,' in the shape of a carefully compiled register of American books and authors, entitled "Bibliographical Guide to American Literature,' &c., pp. xxxii, 108. This manual was the germ of the important publication, the title of which the reader will find at the commencement of this article. Now, in consequence of Mr. Tribmer's adminute rafter knowledge has nothing the copy from the Bibliographic of the American books which which is to consult, and the state of the American books which which is to consult, and the state of the American books which which to consult, and the state of the American books which which the cover of the American books which who was means he hopes to enlarge his acquisitions.
