PREFACE.

THE text-book of Eclectic Shorthand was designed to be a complete instructor. The lists of words and illustrations it contains were supposed to be sufficient to enable the thoughtful student to acquire a practical knowledge of the art. For some time, however, there has been a growing conviction in the mind of the author that a dictionary, similar to those used in other systems, would be very helpful. This conviction, strengthened by the frequent inquiry from Eclectic writers for the authoritative writing of some word, and by friendly suggestions of some of the most intelligent teachers and writers of the system, has led to the preparation of this volume.

It is believed by the author that it will be of great advantage in three ways:

1. It will aid teachers, students and writers of Eclectic Shorthand to a prompt settlement of questions that are constantly arising.
2. It will greatly lessen the length of time required to master the art, both of the private learner and of the student in school.
3. It will give a stability to the system, and a uniformity in the application of its principles that can be secured in no other way.

It is intended for writers of all grades of proficiency. Not only the beginner, but also the most practiced writer is liable to feel uncertain and perplexed as to the best expression of a new or unfamiliar word; hence the importance of having at hand a dictionary of phonetic and shorthand words.

To write through this work will be equivalent to writing the entire language; hence it should be written through repeatedly by all who wish to become expert in the use of Eclectic Shorthand.

A few words unavoidably omitted from the list of primitive words are given in a supplement.

That the work will prove invaluable to both learners and practical writers is the belief of

THE AUTHOR

INTRODUCTORY.

PRIMITIVE words are those which can be reduced to no fewer letters and still remain significant English words; as, boy, good, firm.

Derivative words are those which are formed by prefixing, or adding other letters or syllables to primitives; as, boyish, goodness, goodly, firmness, infirm.

There are some words of Latin origin; as, abdicate, convene, adhere, etc., which, although derivatives in the language to which they belong, are generally treated as primitives in English, because they not only have no English root word, but the root which they have is generally, in English, employed as a prefix or suffix.

Compound words are such as are formed from two or more primitive words; as, car-load, type-writer.

It will be seen from these facts that the primitives are the root words from which other words are derived, and that to become a proficient shorthand writer requires perfect familiarity with all the primitive words, and with the prefixes and suffixes which are used with the primitives in producing the derivative words.

In the writing of primitive words the initial part of each is fully expressed, with enough of its termination to clearly indicate the intended word.

In writing derivatives, occasionally a short prefix may be safely omitted, while terminations are either written or clearly indicated, and vice versa, when the initial part of a derivative is fully written, short, uncharacteristic terminations may be omitted.

The student who has thoroughly learned the principles of Eclectic Shorthand, as embodied in the text-book of instructions and the chapter on abbreviations in this work, is prepared to write this dictionary systematically and repeatedly through. Placing this and the practice book side by side, a word should be written, first, carefully and thoughtfully, and then rapidly, but as nearly perfect as possible, as many times as may be on a line, or more, of the practice book.

Each word is accompanied by a skeleton word which indicates exactly what is written in the shorthand outline following it. The shorthand words are written without ruled lines to indicate their position, but the italic character used in each skeleton word is the positional letter of the word; thus, in the first primitive word, aback, the outline abc, having the italic b, indicates that a is to be written on the b, or first position, to express the b and then c added. This means of expressing the position of the first part of a word renders unnecessary the use of ruled lines in this work, yet indicating clearly to the learner the positions of the first letter as well as the character to be expressed by position. Of course the learner will use ruled paper in practice, because he cannot dispense with the ruled lines safely until very proficient in the use of the system, when his familiarity with the outlines of words will enable him to write with perfect confidence on unruled paper.

In the skeleton word a prefix or suffix is indicated by separating the letter which represents it from the rest of the word by a short dash, as in the words, abbreviate, abdicate and accommodate, which see.

ABBREVIATION.

ABBREVIATION in Eclectic Shorthand is accomplished by the following means:

I. An alphabet of simple characters representing the English alphabet of twenty-six letters, each letter being expressed by a single line.

II. The representation of each diphthong, digraph, trigraph and coalescent compound of the language by a simple, distinct character.

III. A positional alphabet representing each letter of the entire alphabet by a definite position with reference to the line of writing, in which position each character representing a letter, digraph or trigraph may be written to express the letter following it, represented by the position.

IV. The representation of uncoalescent consonant compounds of frequent occurrence by a single character.

V. The lengthening of the long alphabetic characters and the p and g to express a following m or n, and enlarging the surface characters, viz., p, g, h, r, l, sh, ch, wh, sp, st, us, pch and retraced v, to express a following t or d.

VI. The shortening the short alphabetic characters to express a following t or d; also diminishing them to mere ticks to express a following m, n or y, and diminishing the surface characters to express a following l, ly, ling, fl, fly, fling.

VII. The representation of frequent lengthy and compound prefixes and suffixes by a single character.

VIII. The representation of a few frequent words, each by a single character called a word sign.

IX. The representation of frequent simple phrases and phrase words, each by a simple character of one line.

By these principles, singly and combined, are produced an almost endless number of two, three, four and five letter syllables, each expressed by a single simple character, affording ample means of brevity for verbatim writing, probably unequalled in the history of practical shorthand.

NOTE.—The above method of expressing the words satisfy, satisfied, satisfaction and satisfactory may be written across any preceding word in a similar manner.

SUFFIXES.

REMARKS ON THE USE OF SUFFIX SIGNS.

IN general a single suffix sign will serve to express an entire class of suffixes; as, the words sub-tract, sub-tracts, sub-tracted, sub-tracting, sub-traction, may all be represented by sub, with tr written near it, relying on the context to determine the part of speech, tense or participle. That this is not only possible but safe, is evident from the following illustrative sentence, in which the same form is used for the various forms of subtract, and the learner will readily supply the correct word: Can you sub-tr this? Have you sub-tr this? Are you sub-tr this? Can you perform this sub-tr?

Take the various forms of indicate: Can you ind-c (indicate) it? Will you ind-c (indicate) it? Have you ind-c (indicated) it? This clearly ind-c (indicates) that. What is the ind-c (indication)? What are the ind-c (indications)? There is no ind-c (indication) that it will. There are ind-c (indications) of it. The signs are all ind-c (indicative) of a storm. The signs ind-c (indicate) a storm. There is every ind-c (indication) of a storm.

Take elect in its various forms: We will el-e him. We have el-e our ticket. We can el-e our ticket. The el-e is in progress. We are el-e our ticket. The independent exercise of the el-e franchise. He was el-e to serve as one of the presidential el-e.

Take adapt with its various forms: It is not ad-a to him. It is very well ad-a. With ad-a facility. A perfect ad-a of the means to the end. We are ad-a it, or trying to ad-a it.

COMMERCIAL TERMS.

IN the first three following vocabularies there are necessarily some repetitions, from the fact that certain terms are common to the three classes.

In words beginning with com, con, it may be optional with the student to choose either method of expression, but the outlines given authorize the use of c lengthened, while those who write a fine hand may prefer and use the prefix form.

TERMINATIONS OF MEDICAL TERMS.

THE regular formation of this class of words makes it possible to greatly abbreviate their shorthand representation by adopting signs for the more common terminations. The signs consist of one or more of the initial letters of the terminations and are hence very suggestive and easily memorized.

On the following five pages is a list of terminations with their signs, given in both Roman and shorthand characters, alphabetically arranged for ready reference.

In practice the sign is drawn across the last character of the initial part of the word, except in words having terminations common to other words, as sation, tation, fusion, etc., which signs are to be written under or over the previous characters, as in other words.
