lapse was there will no longer be to check such things!

The public may have been shocked at Czecho-Slovakia's disappearance, but few public statesmen of Europe were surprised. Even the more naive statesmen were convinced a year ago, when Germany marched into Austria, that the former would expand her political and economic hegemony over the rest of Central and Eastern Europe.

SO now the statesmen are not worried so much about present developments as such, but are concentrating their energies in figuring out and discounting if possible 1940, 1941 and the years thereafter.

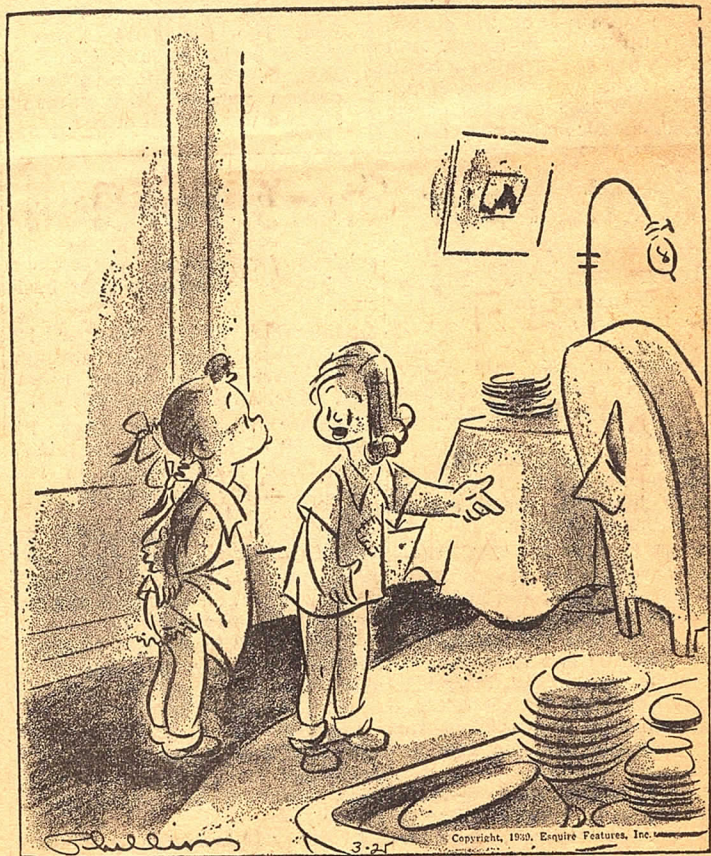

Unlike the general public, they will have a pretty fair idea in advance of what is likely to happen. They will then prepare in advance to meet these developments. The public will know virtually nothing of these developments until they explode in the public face—as they have done these last two weeks.

Yet, the strange part of it is this: If the average citizen tries to think along the same lines the statesmen are now trying to figure, he will not be unduly startled when the predicted developments become reality.

RESPONSIBLE statesmen feel that there is small likelihood of war flowing out of the present situation despite all the scare headlines in America from day to day. Their thinking is predicated upon the fact that neither territory nor property of France or Britain has been touched directly. The British never involve themselves in ruinous conflicts unless British territory or vital British interests force them into such war.
